other airlines while Fuller remains in business.

Fuller's company will remain in business until the judge rules on whether Fuller's sale of Frequent Flyer coupons is beyond the bounds of the law.

Derr said that in one two-day period in 1986, $145,891 passed through hands of one of Fuller's agencies

It is estimated TWA lost several million dolars in 1986 and American consumers lost travel miles, discount rates and several other benefits.

The injunction issued against Fuller and his travel business relations stated that "all persons acting in participation with him are restrained from: issuing, selling or causing to be issued or sold tickets for travel on TWA."

The original injunction was issued Oct. 14, 1986, and Fuller was still selling tickets for travel on TWA in Decmber 1986.

Monday's hearing was before U.S. District Judge Howard Turrentine.

In separate action, Turrentine heard testimony on a class action suit filed by Frequent Flyer Club members who contended their travel rights were violated by several airlines' restrictions on coupon transferability.

Attorney William Hanley, who is also Fuller's defense attorney, argued his class action clients were entitled to benefit individually from the pool of miles accumulated by all Frequent Flyer Club members and that the airlines' restriction of nontransferrability negated the benefits.

The airlines named in the class action suit were American Airlines, TWA and United Airlines.

Turrentine is expected to rule on both cases within the week.

TOPEKA - People who perform lie detector tests in Kansas would be regulated and licensed by the state under terms of a bill introduced Monday in the Kansas House.

The measure would establish a five-member "Kansas Board of Polygraphists," which would license all operators of lie detector equip-

The proposal also outlines requirements to receive a polygraphist's license, which include on-the-job training equivalent to 250 lie detector examinations.

Rep. Nancy Brown, R-Stanley, the primary sponsor of the bill said the state currently has no standards governing polygraph examiners.

By BECKY HOWARD Staff Writer

The American economy has died and America is still in the denial stages, an economics professor said in a lecture Tuesday. In his address Tuesday evening in Union Forum Hall, Lester Thurow, professor of economics and management at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said although his statement was harsh, it was a good way to sum up America's economic situation. Thurow's speech, "U.S.-Japanese Economic Relations," was the first of the spring 1987 Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs.

Thurow said the trade economy in the United States has died and been America is still going through the first two stages of the five psychological stages of response to average, is merely average in the death and dying.

"The first of these stages is the denial stage. Ronald Reagan's claim that America could outmarket, outproduce and outsell any other country in the world sounds good, but it is an example of the denial stage because with a $170 million trade deficit, the exact opposite can happen," Thurow said.

The second stage of death and dying in the American economy is: either it's not fair or the United States is being treated unfairly, he replaced with a world economy, but billion trade surplus by cheating so it's not unfair," Thurow said. He said currently America, on the > trade industry. "In the 1950s and '60s, America's superiority in world trade was based on the fact that we had products the rest of the world didn't have. Now, > the world is different and the U.S. no longer has that effortless technological superiority," he said. "From now on, we will be competing solely on the price and quality of our products.'

He cited several reasons why America is behind in the technological industry race, including lack of education in math and science, a shortage in savings and investment, lower emphasis on research and development and a need to trim the American standard of living as if it were going to a "fat"

He also said America has revolutionized into a "service economy," where 60 percent of jobs are now in health care, business and legal ser-

Thurow speculated on the U.S.-Japan economic correlation.

What we do know is that no country will forever run a trade deficit or a trade surplus. At some point in time, America's addiction for a high standard of living will result in the disappearance of the trade deficit in that it will become a net debtor and have to have trade surplus to pay interests on those debts," he said.

Thurow said in correlation to this,

President discloses notations

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - President Reagan, awaiting another interview by a board investigating the Iran-Contra affair, approved giving typewritten transcripts of his personal notes to members of the panel, the White House said Tuesday.

Presidential spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the board, which is to question Reagan on Wednesday, gave the dates that they were interested in, meetings and so forth.' He said the president "provided the excerpts which were typed up and presented to the (board's) staff.'

Reagan "made the initial selection" of what notes to provide to the panel headed by former Sen. John Tower, Fitzwater said, adding that the president did not decline to provide anything that was requested.

"He has from the very beginning been very open and honest in dealing with all of these issues, has gone every step of the way in trying to make information available," the spokesman said, adding he "could not make a judgment" on whether the notes shed any light on how the program of secret arms sales evolv-

Liquor price rates cause controversy

effects of markup controversial law

By CHAD L. SANBORN Staff Writer

The shifts in the state's minimum price markup for liquor have caused some Manhattan liquor store owners both long-term and short-term problems.

The markup shifts, from strict enforcement to relaxed enforcement and back again, are the source of these problems. The markup is designed to deny the stimulation of the sale of alcohol, while still providing profits for the industry. Attorney General Robert Stephan said Monday the markup violated federal antitrust laws. In response to Stephan's comments, John Lamb, director of the Kansas Alcohol and Beverage Control Agency, said he was considering not enforcing the markup law. But Gov. Mike Hayden filed an injunction Tuesday that would make the attorney general's office enforce the law until the Kansas Legislature or the courts eliminate it. This came after public disagreement between Hayden and Stephan concerning Stephan's comments about the markup. Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel's Retail Liquor, 1129 Bluemont Ave., had already acted on Stephan and Lamb's comments. The injunction has altered his business plans.

TOPEKA - Aides of Attorney General Robert T. Stephan and Gov. Mike Hayden are scheduled to meet Wednesday afternoon to discuss whether the state should continue to enforce a liquor law considered unconstitutional by the attorney general.

One state official said Tuesday a friendly lawsuit is being considered as a way to end the debate over the controversial law, which requires the state to establish a minimum price markup for bottles and cases of liquor for sale at the retail level.

A not-so-friendly lawsuit also might be forthcoming from liquor store owners who already are dropping their prices in response to Stephan's opinion.

Wichita retailer Herb Cohlmia started slashing prices on his merchandise Monday.

"I think the governor's making a very bad mistake," he said. "I think he's wrong and I'm going to go ahead with it right now. If they want to come in and close me down, they can do that, but they'll have to take it to court, and we'll win in court.

Stephan says the markup law violates federal antitrust statutes, is unconstitutional and should not be enforced. He said a Jan. 13 decision by the U.S. Supreme Court which struck down a similar law in the state of New York also applies to Kansas'

Cheerleading stunt safety, and injuries incurred by a former K-State cheerleader, have raised concern at the University.

we could make it happen." Accidents prompt limits on cheering

By JACKIE SHOCKEY Collegian Reporter

Although the crowd may see it as just an in-between act, the safety of the "sport" cheerleading has become a major controversy throughout the Big Eight Conference, and a lawsuit filed by a former cheerleader has brought the issue to K-State.

More and more athletic departments are placing additional requirements on yell and cheerleading squads because of a number of recent accidents.

Theresa Riddle filed the action Aug. 4, 1986, after being injured while practicing a pyramid-building stunt at a Tennessee cheerleading camp in August 1984.

Riddle is suing in spite of a release form she signed before joining the squad to release the school from any liability for injury

Riddle claimed her back injury involved a fractured vertebra. She charged K-State along with the coaches and the Universal Cheerleading Association camp with negligence.

"Theresa tried to handle this in a professional manner," said Eugene Ralston, Riddle's lawyer. "However, the University wasn't cooperating with her to her satisfaction.

"Theresa is asking that all her medical expenses along with any disability that she might suffer be covered and that she be reimbursed for any trauma that she has incur-

One issue to be resolved as a result of the trial is how binding the release

"The issue will be decided by a udge before a trial date is set,"

Ralston said. Cheerleaders and yell leaders voiced concern that if Riddle won her case, thus proving K-State negligent, the yell leading team would be cut.

'We certainly would not cut the yell leading program. It's a part of K-State's tradition," said Athletic Director Larry Travis, adding the University's No. 1 priority should be the students' safety.

Safety restrictions prohibiting cheerleaders and yell leaders from performing some more difficult stunts have resulted in mixed feelings between the squad and the athletic department.

At the beginning of basketball season, Travis prohibited cheerleaders from performing overtwo-people pyramids, but in early January pyramids were reinstated after cheerleaders agreed to adopt the Universal Cheerleading Association's guidelines concerning safety.

The guidelines prohibited the performance of pyramids three people or more high, the split catch (a catch considered hard on the hip sockets) and use of a mini-tramp.

'K-State has such a great reputation for having a good squad, and we were limited," said Jim Thorp, senior in information systems and head yell leader. "I think mainly we are looking for safety also. We did implement the design built-in spotters two years ago for this purpose.

K-State cheerleaders permanently incorporated spotters within the pyramid structure to make it more stable

But Travis voiced doubts that they will continue to perform more difficult stunts.

"I think the 'ah' ... isn't as important as the 'sis-boom-bah,'" Travis said. "I think they'll start getting back to the cheers rather than the stunts. Worries concerning more

3 teens charged in racial murder

NEW YORK - Three teen-agers were charged Tuesday with murder and nine others with lesser crimes in a racial attack in which a white mob chased and beat three black men, one of whom fled into traffic and was killed by a car.

The suspects, ages 16 to 18, surrendered Tuesday morning to police in the New York City borough of Queens, where the attack took place

The 12 defendants, accompanied to state Supreme Court by parents and lawyers, were arraigned before Justice Alfred D. Lerner. All pleaded innocent.

Two of the three youths charged with murder Tuesday had previously faced the same charge until a judge dropped it for lack of testimony by the survivors of the attack. Those charged with murder again were Jon Lester, 17, of South Ozone Beach, and Scott Kern, 17, of Howard Beach. The other youth charged with murder was Robert Riley, who was described by special prosecutor Charles J. Hynes as the only defendant who cooperated in the investigation. The indictment charged that Kern, Lester and Riley caused the death of Michael Griffith, 23, by chasing him and forcing him to run onto a highway, where he was struck by a car and killed. The indictment also charged that several defendants attempted to kill Cedric Sandiford, 36, by striking him in the head with a bat and kicking and punching him. The third victim of the attack was

Timothy Grimes, 19. According to the indictment, several defendants saw the three men in a pizzeria in Howard Beach, a predominantly white section of Queens. Lester, it said, told his friends: "There were some niggers in the pizza parlor...Let's go back and kill them."

Officials investigate Finders farm

MADISON, Va. - Authorities excavated a plot Tuesday on a farm used by the Finders but found no evidence of human remains, while a police spokesman in Florida called on the group's leaders to help identify six ill-kempt children taken into custody last week.

Charles Vaughan, a Virginia state police spokesman, said the investigation has turned up no evidence of criminal wrongdoing by the Finders, a communal group founded in the 1960s which used two farms here owned by the family of the group's reputed founder.

"I think we're at a point where it would be safe to say we're into a situation where the investigation is becoming routine," Vaughan

The Finders became the subject of a multistate probe last week, when two well-dressed adults believed to be members were arrested in Tallahassee, Fla., in the company of the four boys and two girls.

In Florida, The Miami Herald reported Tuesday that the children had not been sexually abused, while authorities in Tallahassee abandoned their description of the group as a satanic cult.

Klan 'suggested' murder, man says

MOBILE, Ala. - A former Ku Klux Klansman serving a life term for his part in the 1981 murder of a black teen-ager testified in a $10 million civil rights lawsuit Tuesday that the crime was "suggested" by his Klan superiors.

'All I know is I was carrying out orders," said James "Tiger" Knowles, who pleaded guilty to violating the civil rights of 19-yearold Michael Donald. Donald's body was found hanging from a tree in Mobile on March 21, 1981.

Donald's killers were motivated by the white-supremacy doctrines of the United Klans of America, Morris Dees, an attorney for the youth's mother, said during opening arguments.

Dees told the all-white jury he wants it to grant a verdict that will 'set the kind of example that will ring out around this state and country that good people will not tolerate this type conduct."

Knowles' testimony led to a 1984 death sentence in the case for Henry Francis Hays, a fellow member of the local United Klans chapter, Klavern 900.

Khomeini delivers public speech

NICOSIA, Cyprus - Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini declared Tuesday that Iran's long conflict with Iraq is a holy crusade and his fundamentalist regime will make "war until victory.

The 86-year-old Shiite Moslem patriarch delivered his first public speech in nearly three months on the eve of the eighth anniversary of Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi's fall from power.

There have been rumors that Khomeini is in poor health, but his voice was strong and steady during the 17-minute address broadcast by Tehran radio. His remarks also were reported by the official Islamic Republic News Agency.

Khomeini said Iran was battling for a "divine cause" in the war. which began in September 1980 with an invasion by Iraq.

"Families and children are now being killed and this is hard for us and brings pressure to bear," he said.

'Peace' sign takes on luxury look

PRAIRIE VILLAGE - Some students attempting to turn back the clock for a "Hippie Day" observance at Shawnee Mission East High School got their symbols mixed up.

Instead of the peace symbol associated with the anti-war movement of the 1960s, the symbol they painted on a sign was the threepronged logo of the Mercedes-Benz luxury automobiles

"I guess we were kind of ignorant about that," said Beth Jennings, 17, one of several students who painted the sign. "Only at Shawnee Mission East would they mistake a Mercedes sign for a peace sign," said Bill Boley, an English teacher at the school, which draws many students from affluent areas of suburban Kansas City

Boley said that after the error was discovered, the sign was discretely altered to make it correct.

"I don't think there was anything to be upset about," said Jennings. "I mean, they are so similar and everything, anybody could make that mistake.

The peace symbol consists of a vertical line with two shorter lines extending at an angle from it to the bottom of an enclosing circle. Extending one additional line from the center of the three lines in the Mercedes logo gives a symbol similar to the peace sign. Jim Lockard, a teacher and sponsor of the student council, said he thought the mistake was understandable.

Senate committee backs salary cut

TOPEKA - The Senate Ways and Means Committee today endorsed a bill which cuts legislative salaries but misfired on an attempt to cut the salaries of all state employees earning $50,000 or more each

Each of the 165 members of the Legislature would take a $6- perday pay cut in a symbolic gesture of fiscal restraint during the state's financial crisis. Daily salaries would drop from $54 to $48 under the bill, which now advances to the floor of the Senate for possible debate and action.

During the 90-day legislative session, the 40 senators and 125 representatives each are paid $54 daily in salary and $65 per day for expenses. During the remainder of the year, from April to December, members of the Legislature are paid $600 per month.

The $6-per-day cut will save $101,970 for the final six months of the fiscal year, which ends June 30. The reduction will be retroactive to

There was little discussion of the bill by the budget committee, although more than an hour was spent on the proposal to dock all state employees making $50,000 or more each year.

At one point, the committee endorsed the bill on a 7-3 vote, but only after stripping it of its impact on unclassified faculty at the six regents universities.

However, Sen. Mike Johnston. D-Parsons, forced the committee to reverse itself after having second thoughts about the amended bill

Bennett's state-by-state report gives schools mixed grades

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Secretary of Education William J. Bennett handed out mixed grades Tuesday on his annual state-by-state report card and called the results "a hangover after the binge" of recent school improvements.

Bennett expressed confidence that school reform "is still on the move." But he said an impediment to better schools is "the growth of 'The Blob" state and local education bureaucrats whose ranks expand even when enrollments contract.

Bennett released two wall charts comparing school statistics from 1985-86 with 1984-85 and with 1981-82.

"This year, after four years of improvement, we have basically held steady," Bennett said. "In 39 of the 50 states (college entrance) test scores improved over the previous year. But the graduation rate has declined slightly."

It was the fourth year that the Education Department has produced a chart ranking states by college entrance test scores, graduation rates, teacher salaries, class size and other measures.

He singled out for praise the states of New Jersey and South Carolina for their wide-ranging school reform efforts, including plans to intervene in "academically bankrupt"

But the wall chart, as it has in the past, drew flak from critics who view it as simplistic, incomplete and possibly misleading.

Education The National Association issued a statement blasting "the Department of Education's wall-chart follies (which) raise more questions than they answer." It noted that federal funds paid only 6.5 percent of public school bills in 1985, down from 7.4 percent three years earlier, and it suggested the cutback may "have flattened out the curve of educational progress.

FairTest, a Cambridge, Mass., group often critical of the testing industry, said Bennett's new wall chart should bear the legend, "Warning: Gross misuse of test scores is dangerous to the nation's educational health.'

The wall chart also ranked states on their minority and handicapped enrollments, youngsters living in poverty and other characteristics. It provided a checklist of which states have enacted such changes as merit pay, minimum competency tests and mechanisms to take over the worst

The 1981-82 year was chosen as a benchmark because it was the year before a Reagan advisory panel report, "A Nation At Risk," rocked the schools into raising standards.

Scholastic Aptitude Test scores for the class of 1986, as reported last fall, were unchanged at 906. The test is scored on a 400 to 1600 scale. American College Test scores, on a scale of 1 to 35, rose from 18.6 to 18.8.

The public high school graduation rate for 1985 - the latest year available - was 70.6 percent, down from 70.8 percent in 1984.

The average teacher salary, based on NEA statistics, was $25,313 for 1985-86, up from $23,595 the year before. The average class size fell to 17.9 pupils per teacher from 18.1. The average expenditure per pupil in 1985 was $3,449, up $276 from 1984. The average minority enrollment was 29 percent, ranging from a high of 96 percent of pupils in the District of Columbia to only 1 percent in Vermont and Maine.

Twenty-eight states were ranked on average ACT scores, since more of their students take that test. Twenty-one states and the District of Columbia were ranked on SAT

Iowa posted the highest average ACT score, followed by Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, and, tied for fifth, Colorado and South Dakota.

The five highest SAT states were, starting at the top, New Hampshire, Oregon, Delaware, Vermont and Connecticut.

The five lowest ACT states, from the bottom, were: Mississippi, Louisiana, West Virginia, Oklahoma and New Mexico.

The five lowest on the SAT were: South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, District of Columbia and

The five states with the highest graduation rates were: Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, North Dakota and

The five with the lowest graduation rates were: Louisiana, District of Columbia, Florida, Mississippi and South Carolina.

Speakers scheduled for Landon Lecture series

By The Collegian Staff

A Nobel Prize-winning economist and a political columnist have been named as scheduled speakers for the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues this spring.

George Will, Washington Post political columnist and commentator on ABC's "World News Tonight," is scheduled to speak in McCain Auditorium at 10:30 a.m. on April 15, said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Alfred M. Landon Lectures on Public Issues and assistant to the president.

The second speaker, Franco Modigliani, will deliver his lecture in McCain Auditorium at 1:30 p.m. on April 21, Reagan said.

Modigliani has been recognized internationally for his knowledge on monetary theory, capital markets and corporation finance, Reagan said. He has been a consultant to the U.S. Treasury Department, the Federal Reserve System, the Bank of Italy and the Bank of Spain.

Reagan said Will and Modigliani were asked to take part in the series because "they're outstanding people" and are "actors on the political scene."

The series, established in 1966, was named after former Kansas Gov. Alfred Landon of Topeka.

Nation must accept grim reality of AIDS

Now that coroners have concluded that Liberace did in fact die of AIDS, all the speculation about how this famous person died can subside until the next Hollywood death is imminent. And then, undoubtedly, it will begin all over again. For people across the country, confirmation of the cause of Liberace's death created different reactions.

To his fans, delving into what they perceived as an unnecessary investigation tarnished his image permanently. To those who thought his flamboyant lifestyle and sexual persuasion were morally questionable, the autopsy represented a morbid type of justice. After all, he did have it coming to him, right? Unfortunately, this twisted logic is all too common.

But this column is not a tribute to or a recollection of Liberace's career. Nor is it a detailed examination of the virus that killed him. After all, Liberace is not unique, in that he is just one in a line of celebrities subjected to endless and ultimately worthless speculation. First, it was Rock Hudson. Then came the rumors about Burt Reynolds, his sexual preference and possible links to the disease. And now Liberace's death. The speculation goes on incessantly, oblivious to rational thought. And for what?

America's attitude toward AIDS needs serious adjustment. It is an attitude that, in just the few years since AIDS has become a household acronym, has become dangerously antiquated. The pervasive attitude toward the disease is basically one of denial. There is the denial first that it is found in the mainstream American community, if such a community exists anyway. Then there is the denial of the disease's seriousness. Too many people view it as only another label to be attached to some "undesirables." It is not viewed as the most serious medical crisis this country is facing or perhaps ever has faced.

What, then, is AIDS? It is an irrevocable death sentence. It no longer discriminates on the basis of sexual preference — if it ever did - and it certainly is no longer a disease only the homosexual community should fear. It never was "designed" by a higher force to "punish" homosexuals for their lifestyle, as some people have maintained.

If it was, then what horrible sin did the millions of cancer victims commit? If it was, then what did the Legionnaires do to deserve the affliction that singles out only them? If it was, then what did the babies born with Down's Syndrome do to deserve their fate?

Those who truly believe AIDS is a disease of punishment deserve pity, for their biases have overshadowed their sense of reality. They view the disease as a sort of divine vindication of their disapproval of others' lifestyles, and no amount of reason can change their beliefs.

Much of the furor over AIDS is reminiscent of the days when association with tuberculosis often meant the loss of a job or friends. It's as shameful as it is pitiful that in the ensuing decades since the TB scare we've learned little or nothing about the transmission of such deadly, contagious diseases. Although I am much too young to have been associated with the disease in any way, I do know how people reacted to it then, and how people would react to it now. In essence, the former was an overreaction. Today, in retrospect, the furor seems ridiculous.

Just as the TB response was an overreaction, so it is with the AIDS epidemic now. People are losing their jobs not only because they have it, but also because they know people who have it. That is insane. People are losing lifelong friends who have found out their "buddy" has contracted the disease. That too is insane.

Consider the disease from the perspective of someone who has just been told they have it. Not only do they have to go through all the stages of accepting the disease itself, but they also must somehow prepare themselves for the possible questions their family and friends are undoubtedly thinking. Suddenly their whole lifestyle comes under suspicion.

If you don't believe that happens, just think back to your image of Rock Hudson before he had AIDS and after you learned he was dying from it. If you're like most everyone else, your perception of Hudson degenerated from one of a Hollywood legend to one of a tormented man who became the subject of cheap cover stories in tattler magazines and newspapers. He was no longer the silver screen demigod he once was.

Can you imagine being diagnosed with a terminal disease and having your friends abandon you, your employer reject you and your family look down on you? Unfortunately, this is the reality for many AIDS victims.

It's time this country began treating AIDS as the killer disease it is and not as only the "gay plague." Only then will advances on both the medical and attitudinal fronts be

The plot for a new Rambo movie? No, this was the scenario terrified students faced at four Tennessee high schools Feb. 4 when the Tennessee National Guard descended upon the unsuspecting students. The rationale behind the "invasion" was a patriotism rally designed to make students aware of the threat posed by the Soviet Union.

A Guard spokesman said 18 Tennessee schools have been host to the rallies since November. and the rallies on Feb. 4 were the first to prompt criticism. If that's true, it's incredible. Nonetheless, the Guard was way out of line in conducting these raids.

again. The soon-to-be-aired mini-series "Amerika" is a fictional account of the United States being occupied by the Soviet Union. But more to the point, it is a demonstration of the Cold War paranoia that is fostered by Ronald Reagan and others of the conservative right. These people are overpowered by the idea that the Soviet Union will invade the United States and send us all to labor camps. This idea is also the guiding force behind American foreign policy. It is an idea that warrants a closer examination. A few years ago, a movie called "Red Dawn" was released, portraying much the same idea. This movie was perhaps best described by ex-CIA agent John Stockwell at a lecture at K-State. He called it a movie where "the Russians invade America and are stopped by the high school football team." If this sounds a bit far-fetched, you're right. The whole movie is a comic opera trying to pass itself off as a prophecy of the

For all its lunacy, "Red Dawn" makes some very serious accusations that need to be examined. The movie starts out by listing a series of events that lead up to the Soviet invasion. This listing leads viewers to the conclusion that in order to avoid a Soviet invasion, we must do everything possible to stop these events from happening.

One of these events is the takeover of the West German government by the Greens, a Jeffersonian-style, anti-capitalist, environmentalist political party. A takeover by the Greens is portrayed as being a disaster for the United States, for it draws West Germany into neutrality and out of

But what can America do about this? Is it going to meddle in the internal affairs of a friendly country? There are several members of NATO, and they all have different interests and perceptions. It would be against the very principles NATO is trying to protect to force member countries into taking a hard-line stance toward the

This tactic of placing the blame for the Soviet invasion on the "betrayal" of capitalism by our allies comes up several times during the movie. At one point, it is explained that the governments of Europe decided to stay out of this world war. That is, all except the conservative government of Great Britain, which was fighting the Russians even though it had no chance for

The movie implies that the liberal governments of Europe will side with the Soviets during World War III, so we should try to help them "see the light" and get rid of all the neo-socialists. Again, another invitation to meddle with governments of friendly nations. It also shows the conceited idea that we are always right and everyone

Another event that is to precede a Soviet invasion is that Central America and Mexico will fall to the communist forces of Nicaragua. This is an event that is very hard to even imagine happening. Nicaragua, a country of 3 million people, could not possibly occupy these vast regions that have a population of well over 100 million. For a better picture of this, imagine Massachusetts taking over the rest of the

But, the Soviets could send troops into Nicaragua to help in this takeover. Of course, the United States would never allow Soviet troops to invade Central America. Any movement of this kind by the Soviets would result in another Cuban Missile Crisis and would most likely end the same way, and the Russians already know this.

In the movie, the Nicaraguans are portrayed as being misled by their Russian allies. They help with the invasion and the occupation, but become disenchanted with the totalitarian policies of the Russians. The Nicaraguan officer portrayed in the movie eventually sides with the American rebel forces and quits fighting.

This is meant to show support for the Reagan view that the Nicaraguan revolution was stolen by the communists and that they will eventually come around. The truth of this view, as I have stated in past columns, is seriously in question.

Then there is the aspect of the invasion itself. It is silly to think the Russians have the power to occupy America. They have the power to blow it up, just as we have the power to blow them up. But in order for them to invade, the Soviets would have to have an army of approximately 100 million to 200 million people and the material to supply them. This figure seems a bit large, but when you consider there are almost as many guns in this country as people, this figure may even be a bit low.

THESE DO TEND TO SUPPORT HIS VERSION

Do these figures seem too large? They are somewhat large when you compare conventional army forces. But the time for conventional warfare is past. An invasion of the United States would result in the largest guerrilla war ever fought.

With all of the guns in America today, perhaps half of the population would be fighting against the invaders, not the very few as depicted in "Red Dawn." There is no way the American people would stand still while anyone invaded their homes. An army of 200 million would find it tough going against a guerrilla army of that size.

There were some not-so-hidden overtones on the subject of gun control in "Red Dawn." At one point, a Russian officer orders a subordinate to go to the city hall and seize the gun registration records so they could confiscate all the privately owned guns, just as the Nazis did in Poland in World War II.

This is another silly notion of some screenwriter who is a member of the National Rifle Association. Yes, these gun registration forms could be used to confiscate guns, but these might not do much good. With as many guns as there are in America, soldiers trying to confiscate them might be better off just going to every house. A list of gun ownership would have the names of more than half the people in the country on it. Just looking through the list would be harder than searching every house.

The movie "Red Dawn" portrays many ideas: that our liberal allies will turn on us. that our conservative ones will fight to the end, that Nicaragua will somehow force its neighbors into communism, that gun registration is bad and that the Soviets are threatening to enslave us.

But in this vein, the movie has more in common with the Cold War era propaganda than it does with the real world of today. We can only hope the mini-series "Amerika can be better.

Using refugees

As I am from Concordia, the home of the Manna House of Prayer and the Sisters of St. Joseph, I could not help but react to the Jan. 26 Collegian article "Student organization raises money for refugees." As would be expected, the Sanctuary Movement has its enemies in Concordia, and this opposition is frequently being dismissed as simply a group of bigots. Obviously, there are always a few bigots in every crowd, but many oppose not what the nuns are doing, but instead how they are conducting the movement.

Ever since the first refugees came to the Manna House, the sisters have never stopped publicizing their arrivals and have distributed leaflets concerning the movement and alerting the media of new refugees, etc., never neglecting to mention that they all live in "constant fear" that our government will in some way come after and punish them for their actions

Many Concordians feel that if the sisters were doing this selflessly and wanted only to help the refugees, with no ulterior motives, they would conduct the whole movement secretly and quietly to prevent provoking our government as much as possible, to ensure more safety for the refugees. Instead, by openly broadcasting their actions, it seems the nuns are too concerned with publicity and with achieving a good image; it seems they are more interested in openly defying the law and gaining public attention than in helping as many Guatemalans as they can. Some Concordians have said that were the sisters to conduct the movement as a true underground system should be done, they themselves would willingly do all they could to help the refugees. However, as things stand, it appears the nuns would rather put these people on display, increasing their risk of being caught in order to gain attention.

This, to many Concordians, is very sad, for it is obvious that these refugees, although being at least temporarily helped, are also, unknowingly, being used.

After attending basketball games this year, I have repeatedly heard the announcer tell the crowd to remain seated, or else to stand on the foot runners instead of the top of the seats. We were told that we could see better this way, but come on now - sit at a 'Cats game?

I don't think so. As for standing, at first I didn't think our view was any different if everyone stood on their seats rather than on the foot runners. It seems to make sense to climb higher to get a better view, right?

However, after a self-conducted geometry illustration, the announcer is correct. Try for yourself: 1) Draw the "crowd angle" relative to the court. 2) Extend an imaginary line to the court surface at this same angle from the crowd. 3) Now keep this same "crowd angle," but raise the crowd 18 inches. 4) As before, extend another imaginary line to the court surface from the raised crowd.

Note that more of the court is seen when the height of the crowd is lower. Also, we are less likely to damage the fiberglass seats. Thank you, student section, for standing on the foot runners so everyone's view will be

It's anarchy! No rules or regulations Anarchy? No. It's trying to park your vehicle on campus.

Congress enacted laws to provide parking spaces and access to buildings for its citizens with mobility impairments. Today these laws are being tested by able-bodied beings. These intelligent beings park their vehicles in front of curb cuts, forcing the wheelchair user to hop curbs or roll to the next curb cut, if one exists.

These intelligent beings use claims like "The snow covered the painted markings" or "The curb cuts should be painted Day-Glo orange so we can see them." Let's forget about the campus' appearance for those with no concern beyond their own needs.

"I'm only going to be parked here for five or 10 minutes" - the old loading zone plea. These minds justify parking in the handicapped parking stalls because they are only going to be picking something up, doing a drop-add, etc. It's only a minute, well maybe five or 10 - who cares?

Only the person who has a legal right and need to use that space cares. Hey, if the person using a wheelchair could park any other place and be able to open their vehicle doors fully to get in or out, they wouldn't need handicap parking.

The campus police chief estimates that this year around 30,000 tickets will be issued compared to 18,000 the year before. One possible conclusion to be drawn is that violators feel tickets are cheap and they can afford the ticket! Some people feel fines should be raised. Until a parking garage becomes a reality or an alternate solution is developed or the entire campus is closed to all vehicles, we must live with and obey the present rules.

I don't favor increasing the fines or closing off the campus. If the estimated increase in tickets for this year is accurate, then is this a sign of anarchy? I'd like to see the Student Senate tackle the shortage of parking spaces and make OUR proposal to the administration as soon as possible.

The frustration of not finding a parking space after one pays for a permit is understandable. But don't take it out on the physically limited on our campus. Is it anarchy? That's up to you.

Instructor quality

Patrick Muir's column in the Feb. 9 issue of the Collegian discussed a very important issue - the quality of classroom instruction at the university level. Before eventually revealing he knows many excellent teachers at K-State, Muir suggested that inadequacies he sees here in classroom teaching can be attributed to the fact that K-State faculty members are asked to be scholars as well as

This superficial attempt at an explanation is without merit. A persuasive counterexample received front-page treatment in the same issue of the Collegian. There we saw Al Compaan, professor of physics, placing his body at risk in an attempt to stimulate the interest of students in his introductory physics class. Compaan is obviously a teacher with the characteristics that Muir praised in his column. But Compaan is also a very dedicated and a fact not accomplished researcher revealed in the Collegian article.

I hope Muir will continue his analysis of classroom teaching and write another column. The topic deserves our constant attention. I would suggest that his analysis include a systematic survey, across a wide range of departments, of the scholarly accomplishments of many teachers. He will find that outstanding teachers are, more often than not, outstanding and active scholars.

Members of Silver Wing, a professional service organization, spread their wings Tuesday on the Union lawn during a 24-hour donation drive for the March of Dimes to help combat birth defects.

The drive is scheduled to end at 8 a.m. today, and members expect to earn more than $150 from pledges and donations for research to prevent birth defects, said Dani Wright, freshman in modern languages and vice president of Silver Wing.

Valentine Chocolates

raditions break forth on St.
Valentine's Day as the hearts of true romantics open and gifts of flowers and candy are given as tokens of love and friendship.

A similar holiday was celebrated by the Romans on Feb. 15 when they celebrated Tupercalia in place of Valentine's Day. The event was special to eligible girls because they could put their names in a box and young men were given the chance to draw a name. Whichever name a boy came up with was to be his sweetheart for the next year.

Today, most people try to give potential Valentines a more persuasive argument than telling them they drew their names out of a box. Traditionally, part of the romancing includes persuasion through Cupid's staple food — chocolate.

Those on a hunt for the perfect chocolate in hopes of convincing a potential Valentine have a variety of decisions to make. The savvy shopper knows the important factors to look for in chocolate — homemade or bought, dark or milk, nuts or caramel, imported or domestic, bitter or sweet.

One of the first considerations to be made is imported vs. domestic chocolate. The November issue of Consumer Reports said imported chocolates may be more expensive, but they are not necessarily better. Two of the magazine's highest rated chocolates were Hershey's and Ghiradelli — both American-made.

Callers, a Swiss chocolate, was rated the best dark chocolate. It is also relatively inexpensive at 29 cents an ounce, the magazine said.

In fact, Consumer Reports said some imported brands are not worth their prices. It described Droste, a chocolate from the Netherlands, as having a "cooked and sour-milk taste." Tobler, a Swiss chocolate, received similar comments.

Those on a hunt for the perfect chocolate in hopes of convincing a potential Valentine have a variety of decisions to make.

If American chocolate is best, some may want to bring the theory even closer to home and make chocolates for their Valentine.

Dorothy Bollman, a Manhattan resident, has been making chocolate candies for about 20 years. She said she makes them for friends and family now, but is considering starting a business from her home.

"I don't know what I'll get myself into," she said. "It may be too much work."

Numerous factors play a role in the quality of the chocolate, she said. What determines the best cocoa beans is controversial. Some think the cocoa beans produced on the West African Coast are the best. Others say the location does not affect the quality as much as harvest conditions.

Bollman buys 50 pounds of chocolate at a time from Nestle's Chocolate Co., which combines chocolates from around the world and blends them together so the final product tastes the same each time, Bollman said.

Conching is important to the quality of chocolate. Conching is the process of stirring while making the chocolate. The more it is stirred, the smoother it is, Bollman said.

"Europeans like their chocolate conched a long time," she said. "That's why Swiss chocolate is so smooth."

Most people may find making their own candies rather risky. The possibility of messing up and time are factors to be considered. After 20 years of practice, Bollman only sets aside one afternoon to make a single batch of candies.

One advantage of homemade candies is the maker knows what is inside them.

Knowing what is inside of assorted chocolates, however, is not a problem for shoppers who know their candy companies. Bollman said the design on the top of each chocolate is the key to knowing what is in them.

Companies that hand-dip chocolates "string" a letter or design on the top. After the candy is dipped, a string is left from the dipping chocolate in the pan to the Arricheva Proventina A candy. Candy makers form this string into the code, Bollman said.

"You have to learn each brand," she said. But usually the letter "V" on top of a candy means vanilla, "C" means caramel and "M" can mean marshmallow or mixed. Other letters signify other fillings.

Most large companies do not hand dip their candies. Russell Stover manufactures chocolates using mechanical processes, said Tom Ward, vice president of Russell Stover from the company's headquarters in Kansas City, Mo.

Although Russell Stover candies do not have letters on them, with a little practice it is easy to determine what is inside them because each kind of candy has its own unique mark on the top.

"If you look closely at each piece you would be able to tell," Ward said.

Caramels or chews for instance, will always be square because when they are made they are poured out on a table and cut into rectangles, he said. They also will always be covered with milk chocolate, and each kind will have a mark on the top. The marks will differentiate the caramels from the various kinds of chews

Each cream-filled chocolate will not only have its own design, but also will be covered with dark chocolate and will be round, Ward said.

Identifying truffles, a richer candy than creams, will be a test for most candy tasters. At Russell Stover, they are covered with dark chocolate and are round like the creams. Only those fluent in code reading will be able to distinguish between the two before biting into them.

For those that have only one true Valentine, there are 4-pound, heart-shaped boxes of candy available for around $50. However, small boxes of chocolate-covered cherries that sell for around 90 cents at discount stores may be more practical for those with more than one Valentine to buy for.

Dorothy Bollman, Manhattan, has been making chocolate candies for friends for about 20 years and is now thinking of going into business producing the sweets.

Freshmen may be denied off-campus living

By KRISTI BARANCIK Collegian Reporter

The issue of whether or not K-State freshmen should be required to live in an organized living group has not been settled.

Until two years ago, all freshmen were required to live in a residence hall, greek chapter house, scholarship house or other form of organized living group. This parietal rule required all freshmen to live in residence halls or greek chapter houses, if space was available, unless they were married, more than 21 years old or veterans of the armed services.

"At one time (about 20 years ago), there was a requirement for women only to live on campus," said Tom Frith, director of the Department of Housing.

Later, the University required all freshmen, men and women, to live in organized housing.

Because of opposition from faculty and students, the University abolished this freshmen housing policy, Frith said. "There was a significant element on campus which felt the parietal rule was harmful to our attraction of students," he said. Until a few years ago, organized housing was filled to capacity at the start of each fall semester, Frith

However, current residence hall occupancy is about 86.7 percent. William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, said this compares with Fort Hays State University with about 60 percent occupancy and the University of Kansas with 100 percent occupancy

Because enrollment is just less than 17,500 and students other than freshmen may choose to reside in organized living groups, housing space for all freshmen cannot be guaranteed, Sutton said. Thus, it may not be feasible to enforce a rule that includes such requirements.

"We can't require people to live on campus and not have a place for them to stay

"If we had every place filled in all categories (residence halls, greek houses and scholarship houses), we would have a little less than 8,000 places," he said.

Sutton assigned a committee composed of K-State faculty and staff to review the effects of the current housing requirements. The committee will review as many issues as possible regarding freshmen living on campus and off

We are concerned about retaining the students in school," Sutton said. The committee is gathering data concerning grades, retention and satisfaction of students in both types of living arrangement.

'There were people who felt it was an outmoded policy," Sutton said. "We have intelligent students, and they will decide what is good, bad or indifferent.'

If the committee made recommendations for a policy change, the central administration, college deans, Student Senate and the Alumni Executive Council would review the recommendations and draw a final conclusion.

"A change would be a slow and deliberate process, and there may be other groups involved," Sutton said. The Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, housing department and Panhellenic Council would take part in the decision-making process.

"If you want to change, you're going to have some opposition from somewhere," Sutton said, adding that he has no preconceived notions committee's the about recommendations.

Sutton said he wants flexibility for the students in conjunction with steady enrollment at K-State.

have demonstrated that living in organized housing is desirable for many reasons, including attraction and retention of students," Frith said. "It's not the ideal place for everyone, but most students benefit by the group living experience. I think it would be desirable to reinstate (the policy)."

"I highly encourage freshmen to choose some type of organized group living," said Amy Jo Reinhardt, K-State admissions representative.

'Basically, I find that most freshmen want to either live in the residence halls or choose greek living, however, they are pleased to know that they could live off campus if they wanted to," Reinhardt said.

K-State Players to begin spring season

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

The K-State Players will step into their spring season at 8 p.m. Thursday with "Tomorrow, From Any Window."

The play critiques the media and illustrates how people can become insensitive to the sufferings and horrors of the world through media interpretation.

"Tomorrow, From Any Window" is an unusual show, and deals with very serious themes, said Rhonda Miracle, speech instructor and publicity coordinator for the K-State

French playwright Jean-Claude Grumberg and was originally produced in Paris in 1968.

"Tomorrow, From Any Window" is a satire about the modern media. A family in the production watches a war develop outside its window. The window represents a giant television set which one looks through to sort out what is real and what is fiction, Miracle said.

The family finds it hard to tell the difference between reality and fiction through the window. The viewer can see day-to-day life in the production, Miracle said. "It has you laughing one minute, something's wrong' the next minute," she said.

The plot develops as a nightmare fantasy - sometimes funny and sometimes frightening - and is presented in the tradition of the absurdist theater, begun by Samuel Becket in this century.

"I look at the play as a nightmare exploring the media's interpretation of today's issues, such as war and famine, and how this interpretation affects our everyday lives," said Kate Jackson, associate professor of theater and director of the play.

"Tomorrow, From Any Window" will be presented at 8 p.m. Feb.

> Thursday Feb. 12

The production is written by and saying 'wait a minute, Thursday through Saturday, and again Feb. 18-21 in Nichols Theater. Tickets are $5 for general admission and $3 for students and senior citizens.

Tickets for the production may be purchased from noon to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday at Nichols Hall box office. Miracle said the small seating space at Nichols usually fills during the second week.

Farmer, economist skeptical about farm

By CHRIS HALL Collegian Reporter

An amendment to the 1985 farm bill that would change the system of deficiency payments to farmers probably will not be approved, said Dwight Johnson, Manhattan farmer and K-State graduate.

The bill, proposed by Sens. David Boren, D-Okla., and Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn., provides for decoupling the receipt of deficiency payments from the requirement that farmers have to plant a crop, said Barry Flinchbaugh, professor of agricultural economics.

Deficiency payments are provided by the government to farmers when the market price of a crop is below the target price. In order to be eligible for the payments, a farmer must plant at least 50 percent of his eligible base acreage.

The proposed amendment would do away with this requirement, allowing a farmer to idle his whole farm and still receive the payments.

The decoupling process is logical given the problems we have," Flinchbaugh said. "It would eventually do away with our huge (grain) surplus. The prices would go up, and the government would have drawbacks, he said.

"The farmers in southeast Kansas who got flooded last fall haven't been able to plant their winter wheat," Flinchbaugh said. "This will help cut down on the surplus, but they are being penalized because, as the law stands, they aren't eligible for deficiency payments."

Under the proposed amendment, the land left idle would not be allowed to just go to weeds. Farmers would be required to plant some kind of conservation project like grass or trees. The Conservation Reserve Program, which is part of the farm bill, allows for these types of longterm projects.

"Nobody has come up with a perfect farm bill," Johnson said. There are positive and negative aspects of all of them. From what I know of this (amendment), I don't because of the pressure to cut down on deficit spending.'

Flinchbaugh gives the amendment less than a 50-50 chance. 'The odds are the farm bill will go intact, without any major changes," the decoupling one has the most appeal "If it does pass I doubt it will be effective this year, except maybe on 1987 feed grains." Flinchbaugh said.

University offers program to improve language skills

By KARI COMPTON

Collegian Reporter

In an effort to improve the skills of secondary German and Spanish language teachers in rural Kansas communities, K-State will offer a program to broaden their understanding of cultures through literature and to increase their command of the languages.

The National Endowment for the Humanities, in conjunction with the colleges of education and arts and sciences, awarded a $206,000 grant to Loren Alexander, associate professor of German and education, for the program titled The Foreign Language Institute

For Rural Teachers. A group of 16 German and 16 Spanish secondary school teachers will be paid a stipend of $800 each to attend this institute, Alexander

This institute was developed with the land-grant image of K-State in mind, Alexander said. Land-grant universities were established to provide higher education to people not directly associated with the university.

The two-day workshop will be an introduction to the institute and will give participants time to get acquainted, he said.

Held after three spring conferences, TELENET Alexander said the four-week summer seminar will include videotaping exercises and discussion, exploring new approaches and methods in teaching, as well as emphasis on literature and improvment of teachers' language skills through intensive study classes.

The teachers will write papers and have class discussions about the literature, Benson said.

Though there will be no formal classes on pronunciation and conversational skills, the teachers will speak the language they are studying during the entire time spent on campus, Benson said.

'The only time they should be speaking English is when we (the German and Spanish sections) are working on a teaching technique together," he said.

Following the summer seminar. there will be seven TELENET sessions in the fall to discuss the classroom experiences each teacher is having.

"All discussion on the conference calls will be in the foreign language, except the discussions dealing with pedagogical (teaching) problems," Alexander

Colleges, programs seek re-accreditation

By JEANNETTE O'CONNELL Collegian Reporter

The College of Business Administration and three other programs will learn in April if they have received reaccreditation for the next nine Accreditation recognizes excellence in their specialized area, which means the program is officially noted as one of the better in that area in the nation.

Even though a program may get accredited, it must also go through a re-accreditation process to ensure the program maintains a high level of excellence.

The three other University seeking programs accreditation this year are the College of Human Ecology, the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Department of Construction Science. Ten departments are scheduled to go through reaccreditation in 1987-88. "There is no question in my mind that we have overall high quality," said Randy Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration. He said he is confident the college will be re-

While accreditation reflects high academic standing, it also equally benefits the student.

'This (accreditation) process increases the quality of a degree," said Brett Bromich, senior in business. "If a business knows that your degree is from one of the best, you are more likely to get a job.

Accreditation is set up in principle to protect the employers while assuring the students that a quality education has been made available, said Don Hoyt, assistant provost and director of Planning and Evaluation

Services. It states that the program is of "high merit and merits public confidence," he Accreditation is a "matter of prestige and a way of upgrading quality programs," Hoyt said.

A lengthy process taking about a year to complete, accreditation begins with a self-study report programs for academic compiled by the dean of the college and departmental staff of the particular program.

The report for the business administration college was sent to the American Assembly of Collegiate Schools of Business in St. Louis, which accredits business programs.

AACSB evaluated the report and made recommendations to the business college based on the report. The department then responded to those recommendations, Pohlman said.

Last October, a five-member team selected by AACSB, composed of deans, department heads and individuals from major businesses, then visited the business college. The team spent 21/2 days talking to the business council, the president and provost, students and faculty members to see if they were producing an adequate and quality education, Pohlman said.

The team wrote a report for the committee after visiting the college that ended with a recommendation to the AACSB concerning the re-accreditation.

Pohlman said he will appear before the committee in April to answer any questions they might have about the program.

"(Accreditation) has been worth it in every instance," said Hoyt of the approximately 30 programs that have been accredited at K-State.

He said no programs have ever lost accreditation at the University.

Israel, kidnappers bargain for captives

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Moslem kidnappers were reported trying to strike a deal with Israel on Tuesday that would free 400 Arab prisoners in exchange for three Americans and an Indian held in Beirut and a captured Israeli airman.

The Christian-run Voice of Lebanon and the Moslem-run Voice of the Nation radio stations quoted "reports from Washington and other capitals" as saying the captors might be working through the Red Cross for an exchange.

In Geneva, the International Committee of the Red Cross denied involvement in any negotiations.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir of Israel said his government would be willing to consider a direct request for negotiations, but added that no such request has been made.

Israeli officials say Washington has not asked Israel to meet demands by the kidnap group, the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine, to release 400 prisoners in exchange for the lives of the four educators it holds.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater told reporters in Washington, "Our terrorism policy remains the same, and I reiterate once again that we will not ransom hostages nor will we encourage other countries to do so."

Parrish steals Texans in prep recruiting wars

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

Many dreams and aspirations will begin today when standout prep football players will sign letters of intent with junior colleges and universities throughout the country.

K-State football coach Stan Parrish and his staff have been on the recruiting trail luring high school players who they hope can help the Wildcats improve on their 2-9 record of last season.

"It looks excellent," Parrish said of the outlook for today's signings. everyone we wanted."

In December's early-signing period, K-State signed 12 junior college prospects - mostly offensive and defensive linemen - in an effort to increase the team's size.

Parrish will not personally sign any high school blue chippers because National Collegiate Athletic Association rules prohibit head coaches from being present at signings. His assistants will present letters of intent to prospective 'Cats.

"My assistants are out and in place," Parrish said. "They're callIt's like the CIA around here.'

Five top Kansas athletes are expected to sign with K-State. The cream of the crop among them is Antoine Dulan, a 6-foot-2, 170-pound running back from Topeka Washburn Rural.

Dulan, an All-State performer, rushed for 1,557 yards in 12 games and led the Junior Blues to the Class 5A state championship last season.

Other top Kansas players expected to sign with the Wildcats include Bobby Lawrence, 6-2, 230-pound lineman, Andover; Dan Smedra, 6-3,

"We've got oral commitments from ing in to me every hour on the hour. 251-pound lineman, Chanute; Chris Carter, lineman, Shawnee Mission West; and Doug Warren, 6-4, 250-pound tight end, Augusta.

As for out-of-state recruiting, it appears the 'Cats may have struck it rich in Texas. Seven Lone Star State athletes are expected to sign with K-State, including four players ranked in the top 100 in the Dallas metropolitan area.

These athletes are: Rod Johnson, 6-3, 210-pound tight end, Kimball High School; Chris Martin, 5-11, 170-pound defensive back, Duncanville: James Enin-Okut, 6-1, 190-pound lineman, R.L. Turner High; and Arnulf Mobley, 6-3, 190-pound lineman, Lincoln High.

Other probable signees from Texas include Curtis Madden, 6-1. 200-pound running back, Denison; Dan Needham, 6-0, 170-pound defensive back, Plano; and Chris Thompson, 6-1, 165-pound defensive back, Parrish said K-State had two goals in recruiting for next season - "to improve our quarterback situation, and to get bigger, stronger and more physical offensive and defensive linemen.

K-State nabbed its "No. 1-rated quarterback" in December when it signed Gary Swim from Snow Community College in Ephraim, Utah. Swim, 6-3, 195 pounds, completed 146-of-243 passes for 1,601 yards and 11 touchdowns before suffering a broken collarbone in the team's eighth game.

He finished first nationally among juco teams in passing offense (283.3), eighth among quarterbacks in passing yardage and eighth in total of-

Crowd's noise is now visible part of games

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

Coach Lon Kruger said he would like to see Ahearn Field House's noise meter remain in the red tonight when K-State takes on Big Eight Conference foe Colorado. "It is a real credit to the crowd (the meter)," Kruger said. "I didn't get a chance to observe it much (at the Kansas game), (but) the fans are...always diplaying their interest and support. They really have been fantastic." The meter, designed by two engineering students and professor Bill Dawes, hangs near the scoreboard and consists of four yellow lights and one red light. Red signifies the highest intensity of noise in the arena when lit. The first test of the meter was last week's unforgettable matchup with Kansas. In that game Roger Bennett, senior in engineering technology and one of the designers, said the meter demonstrated how loud it gets during critical points in basketball games. "When Norris (Coleman) made that last shot (in the final seconds against KU) the noise level was 111 decibels," Bennett said. "That's 100 times greater than a New York sub-

This will be the second time this season that the Wildcats (15-6 overall and 5-3 in conference play) meet Colorado (6-15 and 0-8). Tipoff is set for 7:35 p.m. and will be broadcast on the K-State radio network. In their earlier meeting, the 'Cats scored 60 second-half points and dumped the Buffaloes in Boulder, 92-61.

Noise meter or not, Colorado has been suffering miserably in all conference games, not winning one in the last 25. Kruger still dismisses the thought of a blowout by K-State.

"We may make a lot of people disappointed because I'm not anticipating a blowout," Kruger said. "Colorado's a good, quick team who's had some tough breaks."

Kruger said there are several strong points to Colorado's game, but most prominent is the play of Matt Bullard and Scott Wilke. Bullard, a 6-foot-10 forward, leads the team in

Only snow slows K-State's world-class sprinter

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

The only thing that can slow down a world-class sprinter such as K-State's John Williams is snow.

"I hate snow," said Williams, a junior from Lakeland, Fla. "That's the only thing I hate about Kansas...I'm not used to this snow and everything.

"I don't even go out in it," he added. "I go to class and practice but besides going out to party and to a store, no, I leave the snow alone."

Luckily, it didn't snow last weekend, which allowed Williams to attend the Jayhawk Invitational Indoor track meet in Lawrence. At that meet, he proved he is a 1988 Olympic hopeful when he recorded a world-class time and broke the meet record in the 300-yard dash with a 30.13.

The world record in that event is 29.4 and definitely within Williams' reach before he graduates from K-State next spring.

This is quite an achievement for someone who was a wide receiver on the football team and started training for track less than two months ago.

"Basically, we just wanted him to get a good workout," said K-State track coach John Capriotti. "We entered into this very cautiously as he is just coming off football and recovering from an injury. I was surprised he did as good as he did."

Capriotti wasn't the only one unsure last week if Williams should

"I really didn't want to run because I was hurt, but coach told me to go ahead and give it all I got," Williams said.

"It really suprised me that I came back and got a record that quick. I was very happy and pleased about it. I didn't realize I was going to run that fast."

Was there anybody who wasn't shocked at William's performance? K-State football coach Stan Parrish wasn't completely taken by sur-

K-State sprinter John Williams broke a meet record and came less than a second away from a world record in the 300-yard dash Saturday at the Parrish said he isn't worried that running track instead of attending spring football drills will have any bad effects on Williams.

"He's a receiver and running is what he does," Parrish said. "At the end of the track season, he'll probably be a better athlete than the other receivers who went to spring football will be.'

The Jayhawk Invitational was the first time Williams had used starting blocks in a meet. He said he's adjusting to the blocks, but is still having problems with his start in the 60-yard dash. It appears he isn't too slow, though, because he placed third in the 60 at KU with a 6.30.

Taking a look at William's rigorous practice schedule, it appears his worries will soon be a thing of the past. He practices with the blocks about a 100 times every

Many people dream of going to the Olympics and Williams is no exception - except that his dreams may become reality.

"I want to make it to the '88 Olympics in track and break Carl Lewis' records in the 100-meter and 200-meter," Williams said. "That's really my goal. I want to beat Carl Lewis and the rest of them, and break as many records as I can."

In football, Williams hopes to be drafted next year by the Los Angeles Raiders or Miami Dolphins. In the meantime, though, he wants to help the gridiron Wildcats.

"I want to have a good football season next year and if I can, I want to take K-State to the promised land, which is a bowl game."

First-place Lady Cats to host Colorado

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

The Lady Cats are right where they want to be, or at least close.

Following a 72-66 win against Iowa State Saturday in Ames, K-State is tied with Missouri and Oklahoma State for first place in the Big Eight Conference at 6-3.

But watch out for the Lady Buffaloes.

Colorado enters tonight's contest against the 17-5 Lady Cats with a chance to move to the top of the conference standings. The Lady Buffs, 13-9 overall, sport a 5-4 league record and are tied with Nebraska for second place. Tipoff in Ahearn Field House is scheduled for 5:30 p.m., preceding the men's game. Lady Cat coach Matilda Mossman said she is happy with her team's position in the Big Eight race. She also has a positive outlook about the rest of the season.

"We have been playing extremely well, except for the first half up at Ames," said Mossman in reference to Saturday's game when K-State trailed the last-place Cyclones by 13 at halftime. "But our girls made up their minds at the half that we could win and we had a solid second-half performance.

"I think to have a realistic chance (at winning the Big Eight crown), we have to win our three remaining home games and then at least split our two road games," she added.

But the mission at hand for the Lady Cats is Colorado, and the Lady Buffs are playing well. They defeated Nebraska 91-71, and Mossman is concerned about Colorado's potent scoring attack.

"They have been scoring an awful lot of points lately," Mossman said. "Our key is shutting down their offense. We can't let them score in the 80s or 90s and expect to win."

Colorado has won four of its last five games and has averaged 88 points per game over that stretch. The Lady Buffs sport four players scoring in double figures with sophomore forward Tracy Tripp leading the group at 15.9 points per per game. The Lady Cats get the majority of their scoring from their starters. In Big Eight games, K-State's five starters account for 60.6 points of the team's 69.3 average. Center Sue Leiding leads the team with a 15-point average.

Carlisa Thomas, the Big Eight's Player of the Week, averages 11.3 points and 9.7 rebounds a game. She surpassed the 1,000-point plateau in career scoring against Iowa State.

Kansas to test Tigers in critical Big 8 game

By The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. - Kansas must get past a gritty Missouri team in a Big Eight game Wednesday night before a showdown Saturday with Oklahoma that could decide the league championship.

In other Big Eight action Wednesday, Iowa State is at Nebraska and Oklahoma is at intrastate rival Oklahoma State. Saturday's matchups include K-State at Nebraska, Missouri at Oklahoma State and Colorado hosts Iowa State.

Missouri lost by one point to 17th-ranked Kansas in the first meeting of the two teams at Lawrence and narrowly missed beating No. 8 Oklahoma at Norman on Saturday. The Sooners, who had lost at Columbia earlier this year, prevailed 81-78 when Tim McCalister hit a 3-point goal in the closing seconds.

Kansas and Oklahoma are tied for the Big Eight lead at 7-1. Missouri is tied with Kansas State at 5-3. The Jayhawks are 18-5 overall while Missouri is 15-9. Kansas beat Notre Dame Sunday in its last outing as All-American Danny Manning scored a career-high 40 points. Manning, who has made 71 percent of his field goal attempts in his last 10 games, is averaging 24.6 points a game and is third on the Kansas all-time scoring list with 1,654

Kansas point guard Cedric Hunter suffered a sprained ankle Saturday and is listed as questionable for the Missouri game. Reserve forward Keith Harris also is suffering from a sprained ankle and may not be able to play.

Chris Piper, a 6-foot-8 junior, and Mark Pellock, 6-9, were expected to start on the Kansas front line with Manning. Freshman Kevin Pritchard was to start at one guard, with Mark Turgeon taking Hunter's place if Hunter is unable to play.

Derrick Chievous leads Missouri with 24.8 points a game. The 6-8 junior has made 65 of his last 96 field goal attempts, 67 percent, and has made 178 free throws, more than any player in the nation.

Chievous tied his his career high with 34 points at Iowa State last Wednesday, passing Jon Sundvold for second place in Missouri history. Chievous is also averaging 8.7 rebounds a game.

Freshman forward Nathan Buntin has come alive for the Tigers, scoring 36 points in his last two games while making 15 of 20 field goal attempts.

Center Greg Church, a 6-7 sophomore, is averaging 4.7 points and 2.9 rebounds a game. Mike Sandbothe, a 6-8 sophomore, and Lynn Hardy, averaging 11.7 points a game, round out the Missouri first five. Kansas leads the series dating back to 1907 by 136-76.

College 3-point ace Wildcats has shot confidence

By The Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS - Major college basketball's most prolific 3-point shooter is Darrin Fitzgerald, a 5-foot-9 guard who credits hours of long-range practice last summer for helping make him Butler University's career scoring leader.

"I've practiced it enough and I've got plenty of confidence in it," says Fitzgerald, who broke the Butler career record last Saturday and set another school mark Monday night with a 54-point performance against Detroit.

He had 12 three-point goals in the 88-77 victory.

"You have to have confidence to play this game when you're my size, and confidence is one of those things I've always had.'

Fitzgerald had five 3-point goals and 25 points on Saturday, moving past Lynn Mitchem's 1,798 points set from 1979-83. Monday night, he hit 12 of 22 three-point attempts en route to his single-game high that broke the former school record of 49 points set by Billy Shepherd in 1970.

beyond the 19-foot, 9-inch arc. The Bulldogs are 11-11 going into games against Valparaiso on Wednesday night and Evansville on Saturday.

"He just about has carte blanche to unload," Butler Coach Joe Sexson said of Fitzgerald, the first player in the NCAA to reach the century mark on successful 3-pointers this season.

Fitzgerald said he began practicing the long-range shot last summer after the NCAA announced it would be a part of the college game this

"The 3-point rule has helped me out a lot," said Fitzgerald, who averaged 15.1 his first three years. "This summer when the rule was approved I went out and shot like two to three hours a day, about 20-21 feet out, so that I could put up the jumper before the defense comes out to me.'

Butler lost its leading scorer and No. 2 rebounder of last season, Chad Tucker, with a shoulder separation after winning its first four games. The absence of his 22.5 scoring and 7.0 rebounding averages has been a dianapolis, raised his career total to major reason for the team's

Sports suggestions

I would like to express my appreciation of the fine job your sports staff does in covering both University and regional activities. I find the columns present accurate, wellwritten accounts and ideas and attempt to cover many different facets of sports.

I do, however, feel some changes might be helpful in improving the overall quality of the sports section.

My first suggestion concerns the box scores of the men's basketball games. Almost every one of these has contained errors which range from simple statistical mistakes to misspelling player names and even omitting a player's entire statistics. Simple addition, research and double-checking is all that would be needed to correct these errors.

I also believe that printing complete player and team statistics for both the men's and women's basketball teams on a weekly basis would be a useful change. This would enable fans to be more knowledgeable about how individuals and the team are really doing and thereby get them more involved and make them better fans.

7:30-9 M-F Sat. 8-7

And finally, I think the printing of a weekly schedule of University sporting events would be helpful. It would provide students with easily obtained information and would increase attendance to the smaller sports and boost player morale and perfor-

Surgeon general says condom ads needed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Surgeon General C. Everett Koop told a House panel on Tuesday that he favors advertising condoms on network television because the national health threat posed by AIDS "overwhelms other considerations."

Koop said that such advertising should promote disease prevention rather than sexual activity and that, properly presented, it would provide a valuable health service.

The surgeon general, designated the Reagan administration's lead spokesman on AIDS, did not state his position on advertising in his prepared testimony but expressed strong support for it in response to questions from members of the Health and Environment Subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

'The threat of AIDS is so great that it overwhelms other considerations, and advertising, I think therefore, is necessary in reference to condoms and would have a positive public health value," Koop said.

He acknowledged that condoms do not provide 100 percent protection against catching AIDS from an infected partner but added, "With all the failures and drawbacks it's the only thing we have in the way of a barrier."

There is no vaccine or cure for AIDS, and no one is known to have recovered from it.

Koop said abstinence is the only sure way to avoid contracting the disease sexually, but "that's not terribly realistic in our society." Rep. Jim Bates, D-Calif., asked Koop to comment on whether television networks have a particular responsibility because so much programing contains sexual themes.

"You could make a good case that if television networks do indeed peddle all the attractive parts of sex then they should be willing to also peddle something that might prevent the transmission of sexually acquired disease," responded Koop.

"But I think even without that relationship, the threat ... is so great to the people of this country that, of itself, the public health message and the preventative aspects of AIDS that would accompany condom advertising speak for themselves.

Representatives of the three major commercial networks -NBC, CBS and ABC - said at the hearing that they do not carry condom advertisements because network officials believe they would be offensive to the viewers of many affiliate stations.

They noted that local stations are free to carry such ads on their own and that condoms are being advertised locally in 11 television markets. Moreover, they said the networks are keeping an open mind on whether to accept such ads for national distribution.

June E. Osborn, dean of the school of public health at the University of Michigan, said the use of condoms to prevent the spread of AIDS "stands out as a realistic strategy of great importance."

Parents to receive 'K-State News'

Newsletter to tell about campus events

By KIM GREER Collegian Reporter

Parents of K-State students will soon be receiving a letter that begins with something other than, "Dear Mom and Dad, Please send money.'

New Student Programs is compiling a newsletter for the spring semester. The purpose of K-State News is to inform parents of events, issues and important dates on campus.

Marilyn Trotter, director of New Student Programs, said many students believe their parents do not understand the stresses of college life. Since most of the articles in K-State News will be written by students. Trotter said she believes communication between parents and students will be improved.

'Any time a parent knows and understands what is going on, it's better for the student," she said.

Most of the stories for K-State News will be either features or straight news. Trotter said she will try to keep a balance between the Trotter said the newsletter will be mailed during the first week in March to parents of students currently attending or recently admitted to K-State. Parents of graduate students and overseas students will not receive the newsletter because the cost would be too great.

Scheduled to be mailed three times a year, the letter will be provided to the parents free of charge, Trotter said. One will be sent each semester and during the summer session. The exact date for the next newsletter has not been chosen.

Business college receives 'high honor'

By JUDY GOLDBERG Staff Writer

The International Trade Institute of K-State's College of Business Administration was a co-recipient of the President's "E" Certificate for Export Service, given for excellence in U.S. export trade

'It's the nation's highest honor (given) to companies and business organizations for their noteworthy efforts to ensure exports," said Donald Loso, regional director of the U.S. Department of Commerce.

Loso presented the award to ITI and the International Trade Council of Mid-America Inc. Tuesday afternoon at a banquet in the Union Cottonwood Room. The president's "E" award has been in existence for 26 years. "It was introduced in 1961 and was a revival and an adaptation of the World War II "E" penants that were awarded to industrial plants for superior production," he said.

After three years of exportrelated service, a prospective company is eligible to submit an application with an outline of its achievements to the Department of Commerce.

Loso said almost all companies that apply for the award have made significant advances in export trade and therefore attain the ITI and ITC were recognized for a variety of reasons, he said.

'As I read through the application that was submitted to achieve this award, I was impressed with several dimensions of productivity," Loso said.

Three achievements Loso cited were the establishment of a library and information center for international trade, 1627 Anderson Ave: a data base that holds information on 10,000 foreign countries and 4,000 Kansas companies; and trade opportunity seminars and workshops

Carol Rose, assistant director for the 250-300 awards presented ITI, said the Dane Hansen Library of International Trade built in 1985 is the only one in the state offering detailed profiles on international businesses and foreign countries.

The International Trade Council of Mid-America Inc. was established in 1976 with the primary objective of linking business and academia in trade research and education.

Rose said the joint work of ITI and ITC is unique because it directly links the University to business people.

Lapel pins, a plaque signed by U.S. Secretary of Commerce Malcom Baldridge and a flag with the award's symbol "E" were given to ITI and ITC officials.

26-year-old law, which is almost identical.

"I recommend the state no longer enforce its minimum markup law,' Stephan told reporters Monday. "Simply put, this means retail liquor stores have the right to lower their liquor prices.

However, Hayden disagreed with Stephan's conclusion and said the state's minimum markup law will continue to be enforced until the Legislature changes it or the courts specifically strike it down.

"I feel as the chief executive of this state it is our job to carry out the laws of Kansas," Hayden said. "While I may agree with the opinion, I feel it is my job to uphold the law until it is changed.

"I do believe it may spur the Legislature to take it up. I expect it to be moot in a couple months." Hayden's position on the issue put him in conflict with Stephan and left John Lamb, director of the revenue agency's division of Alcoholic Beverage Control, caught in the middle of the dispute.

Rickel said he thinks it will take two to four months before the courts will eliminate the markup.

"We are right back in the Dark Ages again," he said. "But I don't think we (owners of larger liquor stores) are beaten. We're just backed up.

at the retail aspect of the liquor business.

"They are talking about lowering the retail price, but no one is considering lowering the 8 percent enforcement tax or the liquor license fee that owners have to pay," she

The license is about $1,000 dollars a year, Moyer said. She described the enforcement tax as paying for "the privilege to sell liquor in Kansas."

Furthermore, Moyer said if the business is deregulated, owners' profits will dwindle due to high wholesale prices.

"We (liquor store owners) aren't allowed to buy liquor from the distributors. By law, we have to buy from the wholesalers. And we have no choice in wholesalers," she said.

For instance, Moyer said there is only one wholesaler from which she is allowed to buy Jack Daniels whiskey. To get Seagram Seven whiskey, she must go to another wholesaler.

"We can only buy one kind (of liquor) from one wholesaler, and we have to pay what they ask. We have no choice," she said. "But no one is talking about doing anything in that area.'

Moyer said she knows of five Manhattan liquor stores that are up for sale. The owners think they will be put out of business if deregulation occurs. She expects it to take a year before the Legislature or the courts get around to settling the issue.

Ben Behem, owner of Behem's Retail Liquor, 1503 Yuma St., said he was considering lowering his prices, but was proceeding cautiously.

"I don't want to jump the gun on this thing. Profit margin is already low," Behem said. "It all depends on how good a deal I get from the wholesalers.

Although he is in favor of leaving the business the way it is, Behem also feels that for deregulation to work, wholesale prices will have to

"Stores in states that are deregulated can buy directly from the distributors," he said. "Whether or not it (deregulation) will work, depends on wholesale prices."

November 1986, Dale Baldwin seriously injured his spinal cord in a cheerleading accident. Baldwin is permanently paralyzed from the neck down

In addition to establishing a special scholarship fund for Baldwin, the university's board of directors has established an endowment fund to cover his educational costs.

Cheerleaders' main complaint about overly strict safety regulations is that they practice many hours and aren't allowed to perform up to their abilities.

"I think the three-people-high rule is fair," said Willie the Wildcat, K-State's mascot. "I know that they (cheerleaders) were personally hurt by the limitations imposed before.

"I just want to make it clear that it's not the cheerleaders' fault that they can't build higher.'

'For a while there was no satisfaction, but when the crowd can look at us now, and say 'wow' it really makes us feel good!" said Jeannie O'Connell, senior in journalism and mass communications and cocaptain of the cheerleading squad.

'We really stress safety," she said. "I personally wouldn't go up if I thought I was going to get hurt." Safety is one of the cheerleaders' main concerns, but the question of liability is of definite concern with the University

"If she prevails, they'd probably put more restrictions on our program," O'Connell said of the Riddle case. "I personally don't think I could sue the University because of my strong convictions against that. However, you can't really say what vou'd do.

Travis recently returned from a meeting in Kansas City, Mo., addressing future policies about cheerleading for Big Eight univer-

Travis, along with other Big Eight athletic directors, submitted ideas about how universities should deal with the issue. He said a decision will be reached by March.

'There is much to be said before K-State settles to any final guideplan," said Kenny Mossman, athletic administrative assistant.

Until March, cheerleaders and yell leaders will continue to perform what some consider dangerous stunts while awaiting the directors' material run off from the computer. the spokesman said. "He was a consultant to the NSC and it was necessary to be able to communicate with Mr. McFarlane on on classified matters," Fitzwater said, adding that the equipment was

A TEST FOR

The week of February 8 through February 14, 1987, Dillon Pharmacies in conjunction with KAKE Channel 10 and St. Francis Regional Medical Center will participate in a colon rectal cancer screening program. The Hemmocult test will be used and the program will be entitled "A Test For Life."

KAKE Channel 10 will devote a segment of the news at 12 Noon, 5:00 p.m., 6:00 p.m., and 10:00 p.m. to increase public awareness of colon rectal cancer and of the possibilities of early detection offered by the Hemmocult test. Local residents who had colon rectal cancer will be interviewed as well as those who have used the Hemmocult test to detect their cancer early. Local physicians will be interviewed and comment on the importance of early detection of the cancer. All viewers will be encouraged to pick up free Hemmocult tests at a Dillon Pharmacy. After these tests are completed, they will be mailed to St. Francis Regional Medical Center where the tests will be read by St. Francis at no charge.

Non-pharmacy stores in pharmacy towns will be provided with coupons which list the location of all pharmacy stores. These will be given to customers that request the test in those stores. Customers requesting the test in non-pharmacy stores in non-pharmacy towns will be given a pre-paid postcard which they can mail in to the Hutchinson Office requesting a test which will be in turn mailed to

Computer 'bug' delays tally of Senate votes

Final results may be released at 9:30 a.m.

At 11:50 p.m. Wednesday, David Letterman was on television and Student Governing Association Election Committee members were passing the time by batting a balloon around the Student Government Services of-Candidates for Student Senate and student body president were waiting for the results of the election, counted. The election results were not released due to a "bug" in the computer program used to count the

By midnight, members of the election committee started calling candidates to tell them of the computer program malfunction.

Computer programmers in Administrative Computer Operations sweated into the morning over the malfunctioning program.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said people were working to repair the program, but minutes to count them using the computer, she said. By 12:15 this morning, members of the election committee went home,

It would take hours to hand count

the ballots, but it would only take 10

planning to return to the Student Government Services office around 9:30 a.m. They will either certify the results from the computer or begin the process of hand counting the more than 3,000 ballots.

Tabulated results must be certified by faculty judges on the election committee.

No matter how the votes are counted, the results will be posted in the Student Government Services office today, said Scott Bush, junior in marketing and election committee chairman.

This is the second year the computer program for tabulating votes has been used, Routson said.

The computer used to tabulate the ballots is located in Administrative Computer Operations in Farrell Library. Problems with the computer counting process began early Wednesday evening.

'We ran the job once, and it canceled," said Roxanne Hawkins, data control technician II in Administrative Computer Operations.

In other words, the computer wouldn't finish sorting and counting the ballots.

Although the job ran successfuly the second time, the ballot totals vere listed incorrectly, she said. The problem was discovered when students from SGA went to computer

Athletic fee referendum fails; Senate may pursue proposal

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Staff Writer

It might be finished. The "Non-Revenue Sports Scholarship Fee" bill failed by a 2,165 to 1,518 margin in a student referendum Wednesday.

The bill could have been passed by a referendum in one of two ways: if one-third of the student body voted and one-half of those voting concurred, or if two-thirds of those voting concurred, regardless of the total number of votes cast.

About 4,500 student votes were needed for a simple majority victory. Because only 3,821 voted, the bill needed nearly 67 percent "Yes" votes to pass. The 59 percent figure fell short of that amount.

These referendum figures are unofficial until the election committee certifies them at a special meeting at 9:30 this morning, said Dave Adams, director of Student Publications and one of three faculty election judges

While the referendum votes were hand counted, the results of the Senate elections were to be tabulated by computer. Because of a program malfunction Wednesday night, those results were not available

Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, senior in marketing, said she plans to pursue the issue.

Though highly unlikely, Traeger said Senate could technically pass the bill tonight.

"Senate can pass the fee," Traeger said. "We're going to bring it up. I 'Yes' or 'No,' they just wanted to think something definitely needs to

The greatest opposition for the bill came from the Graduate School and the College of Veterinary Medicine. According to voting percentages, the bill passed by a two-thirds majority in only one college: the College of Business Administration

Traeger said one possibility Senate might consider would be to exempt graduate and veterinary medicine students from the fee.

"Not necessarily because they voted it down, but because there is so much discontent among those people," she said.

Representatives of the athletic department were quite visible during elections Tuesday and Wednesday, which raised some questions about the legalities of the situation.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said Travis had checked with her to make sure representatives could be there. As long as the representatives were more than 50 feet from the voting tables, she said they could stay.

"I think it looks tacky," Students' Attorney Dianne Urban said.

make sure I voted. One coach instructed his athletes to go to the Union and not come to practice until they had found five students who had voted for the fee, the employee said.

With three minutes remaining in the men's K-State/Colorado basketball game, Travis left to go to the Student Government Services office in the Union to find out the referendum results. "I hate waiting," he said. He left instructions to call him in the press box if the results were tabulated before the game was over. "He's been in here three times today checking on the votes," said Jenny Johnston, secretary of student activities, earlier in the day. Travis was disappointed at the referendum results and blamed graduate and veterinary medicine students for the bill's failure.

"In any election in America, if you win 59 percent of the votes, it would be a landslide victory," Travis said. "I don't think there's any question about it - it was an overwhelming mandate." Travis said if more people would have voted, the bill may have pass-

"I'm really sad," he said. "It's something we really need." Travis said the results made him believe that students are supportive of the athletic department.

'We'll just have to wait and see what comes," he said.

The fee, an issue of much controversy since the Student Senateappointed Athletic Fee Task Force began researching its feasibility in August 1986, was sent to referendum two weeks ago by Senate. The fee would have generated about $193,000 to fund 40 percent of the non-revenue sports scholarships based on the current out-of-state tuition rate of $5,440 The referendum read as follows:

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Newspapers in London and Israel said Wednesday secret talks were going on for a major swap that would free foreign hostages in Lebanon in exchange for 400 Arab prisoners.

Lebanese Shiite leader Nabih Berri said there were no talks yet but indications were positive.

Berri, head of the mainstream Shiite movement Amal, made the original proposal on Saturday, setting off a frenzy of rumors, reports and speculation on the hostage crisis. Berri, who is also Lebanon's justice minister, proposed that Israel free 400 Arab prisoners. In return, Amal would return a captured Israeli airman and a Moslem extremist organization would free the four kidnapped educators - three Americans and an Indian - it was threatening to kill. On Wednesday, the Israeli newspaper Davar said Israel and the United States were negotiating a multi-national deal to free all captives held in Lebanon by pro-Syrian and pro-Iranian groups, with Israel freeing 400 Arabs. Davar, which has close ties to Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres' Labor Party, said the deal involved the Swiss and Syrian governments and the International Committee of the Red Cross. The swap would include releasing the airman captured in October and three Lebanese Jews seized in Beirut last year. The paper datelined its report from Washington and quoted unidentified American and Israeli sources.

We have not urged Israel or any other country to be involved in a deal with the hostage takers.'

An Israeli Foreign Ministry official refused to confirm or deny the Davar report.

Israeli officials have expressed doubt that Berri could deliver on promises involving organizations not his

In Washington on Wednesday, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater insisted anew that the United States is not involved in talks with Israel about hostages and said, "We have not urged Israel or any other country to be involved in a deal with the hostage takers." The London Times said Wednesday a "wide-ranging deal" was in the works involving the four educators, the Israeli airman and Arab

It said the negotiations followed 'months of secret contacts between the Israelis and guerrilla leaders in southern Lebanon" through the Red

Officials find cyanide in tea bags

PRINCETON TOWNSHIP, N.J. — A lethal dose of cyanide was found in a tea bag in a supermarket after an anonymous caller said he was told the poison had been placed in one tea bag and cheese products, state officials said Wednesday.

No injuries as a result of the tampering have been reported. The caller, who telephoned the Super Fresh market near Princeton University about 10:15 p.m. Tuesday, falsely identified himself as a reporter for a Trenton newspaper, said Health Department spokeswoman Leigh Cook.

The caller said he was told by someone that the tea bag was in a specific location and had been laced with poison to give credibility to the allegation of tainted cheese, Cook said.

Cook said health officials suspect that the caller masquerading as the newspaper reporter was the same person who tampered with the tea bag.

The store pulled all cheese products from the shelves, but tests conducted through the day by the Health Department and the federal Food and Drug Administration found no more poison, said Cook. No injuries as a result of the tampering have been reported, said

About 10,000 cheese packages were removed from the shelves and about 200 randomly sent to the FDA and the Health Department for analysis, Cook said.

Super Fresh Markets Inc. issued a recall for any cheese products purchased at the supermarket in Princeton Township, said the store's area manager, Dennis Chalela.

AMA executive demands privacy

CHICAGO - The public has no right to know that entertainer Liberace had AIDS or that a hospital doctor suffers from the deadly disease, a top executive of the American Medical Association said Wednesday.

The medical history of a patient, even one who is a public figure or a doctor, should be confidential unless the individual's condition poses a threat to society, said Dr. James S. Todd.

A different view was offered by Dennis O'Leary, President Reagan's attending physician when Reagan was the victim of an assassination attempt and now head of the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals.

"Anytime you become a public figure, you do yield some of your right to privacy," O'Leary said.

Todd, senior deputy executive vice president of the Chicago-based AMA, discussed medical-records confidentiality with O'Leary and two other panelists who represented hospitals and insurers at the American College of Healthcare Executives' 30th annual meeting. Todd criticized the media's "insatiable desire to know what's going

Noting casual contact does not spread AIDS, he also said "a person sitting in the front row of a Las Vegas casino" who shook Liberace's hand doesn't need to know the entertainer suffered from acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

WASHINGTON - President Reagan answered questions from an investigatory board about the Iran arms-sale affair Wednesday, as the White House defended Reagan's refusal to order two key figures in the case to testify.

For the second time in 17 days, Reagan met in the Oval Office with members of the review board headed by former Sen. John Tower, R-Texas. He appointed the panel Nov. 26 to investigate the activities of the National Security Council staff, including the secret sale of arms to Iran and diversion of profits to Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

Bankers reveal work camp plan

STOCKTON - Two Stockton bankers think they have the answer to the troublesome coincidence of too little prison space, a tight state budget and sluggish economic development in rural areas in Kansas. They want to run a work camp in this north-central Kansas town.

Stockton National Bank vice presidents — Lavern Squire and Chris Kollman - began thinking of what kind of development could be brought to Stockton last May, following Forum 86, a meeting of businessmen in Hays.

"The forum helped us realize we needed to take action," said Kollman. "We realized it wasn't just going to be handed to us. We had to go out and look for something. Something good for the community, but not necessarily in oil or agriculture.

Realizing the population of prison inmates in Kansas was rapidly climbing, they contacted the Kansas Department of Corrections and Private Corrections Corp., a Denver firm that operates a prison in Colorado.

The two bankers and PCC have developed a plan to build a 300-bed minimum- or medium- security correctional facility on the outskirts of Stockton, which would employ 130 people.

Board opposes teen sex education

TOPEKA - Members of the state Board of Education said Wednesday they are not ready to order sex education programs taught in Kansas public schools, but they are fully prepared to do it if the AIDS and teen-age pregnancy crises demand board action in the future.

Connie Hubbell of Topeka and Sheila Frahm of Colby told a news conference, they can foresee those problems becoming so critical that the board would have to order programs into place

And, the two board members said, they know mandated sex education programs will be highly controversial.

The board presently recommends that the state's 304 local school districts develop sex education programs for classes in kindergarten through 12th grade, with input from parents, students, teachers and others in their development. It does not mandate those programs,

"The state board, for a long time, has been opposed to mandating too many programs," Hubbell told reporters at a news conference concluding the state board's two-day monthly meeting.

A reason for that, she said, is school districts need different pro-

But if the increases in the incidence of AIDS and teen pregnancy reaches the epidemic proportions some experts have forecast, Hubbell said, "I think that's a possibility" that the state board would order local districts to set up programs to combat the problems.

'Platoon' tops Oscar nominations

BEVERLY HILLS, CALIF. - "Platoon," a searing Vietnam drama that no studio would touch, and "A Room with a View," a period romance regarded as a longshot, scored eight nominations apiece Wednesday to lead the 59th annual Oscar race.

Woody Allen's "Hannah and Her Sisters" and two surprises, the outer-space sequel "Aliens" and "The Mission," a church-vs.-state story of colonial Brazil, were runners-up with seven apiece.

The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences' 4,000-plus voters made these nominations for best picture of 1986: "Children of a Lesser God," "Hannah and Her Sisters," "The Mission," "Platoon" and "A Room with a View," a gentle story of Britons at leisure in Florence, Italy, and the English countryside.

Speech focuses on cultural differences

By SHELLY SHAFFER Collegian Reporter

No place on campus is culturally geared to blacks or native Americans, except the minority service center, said James Boyer, professor in curriculum and instruction.

"I have survived on this campus for 15 to 16 years - and I mean survived," said Boyer, who is black. Boyer's speech, "Cultural Awareness," was part of the Information Series Over the Noon Hour Wednesday in the Union.

There are limited resources and a lack of cultural activities and programs for black Americans, he said. The black population is growing, but it cannot be seen on this campus

"Will I maintain my cultural regeneration, which enhances my black identity?" he asked. Some people at the lecture said some minorities are finding it hard to be accepted on campus. Kathy Greene, acting director of the Educational Supportive Services program, said minority students have told her they were ignored when they attempted to find lab partners in classes.

That is an internal problem that will have to be solved by the students, Boyer said. In cases like this, students must keep trying to integrate themselves in the classroom

More than 60 percent of K-State's students come from communities of under 10,000, Boyer said. Students from small towns may suffer a culture shock because they are unfamiliar with minority students, he

"Minority students must work hard. They have to hear it. They need to know that they can do it," Boyer Minority students can find support in the Educational and Supportive Services Program in Holton Hall. where academic and personal counseling is available.

We are past the legal framework, but social boundries still exist, he said. Minority students must be

Education should peak again in the year 1997, said Boyer. The pre-school population has been increasing. California alone has two million people under 5 years of age. In Kansas, 12 percent of all residents are under that age.

As the age pattern has shifted, the population is not traditional looking because there are more people with mixed and minority backgrounds, Bover said

"Those kids need to ask, 'Who am I and what does that mean?'," Boyer said. Educators need to get a handle on racial labeling and cultural differences, for example, holidays that are celebrated by different cultures.

High school writers to attend conference

By The Collegian Staff

About 450 students from 27 high schools will converge on campus Friday for the Manhattan regional contest of high school journalists.

Students from Topeka, Emporia, McPherson, Chapman. Abilene, Manhattan and other Kansas high schools will compete in the areas of newspaper, yearbook and photography.

The competition is one of five regional contests sponsored by the Kansas Scholastic Press Association, said Dave Adams, director of Student Publications

Adams said the first, second and third place winners will advance to state competition at Lawrence in March.

"What we have is on-the-spot writing contests where people are interviewed (by students), or where contestants come in and they actually design an ad or design a yearbook layout," he

Lawyer claims media unfair to McFarlane

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Robert C. McFarlane, the former presidential aide who is recovering from a drug overdose, has been picked on unfairly because he's the only key figure cooperating in the investigations of the sale of U.S. weapons to Iran, his lawyer said Wednesday.

"He's the only game in town for the press to write about and some members of Congress to complain about," attorney Leonard Garment said, noting that his client unlike other important players volunteered to testify on Capitol Hill and elsewhere.

President Reagan, meantime, is "very concerned and upset for Bud," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater, using the nickname of the former national security adviser who, police sources said, tried to commit suicide Monday

Reagan telephoned McFarlane's wife, Jonda, on Tuesday, but has not spoken to McFarlane, White House officials

McFarlane, 49, remained hospitalized at Bethesda Naval Hospital in suburban Maryland on Wednesday, two days after he swallowed between 25 and 30 tablets of the tranquilizer Valium.

McFarlane was listed in good condition, said Lt. Russ Sanford. a hospital spokesman. Sanford refused to say what type of treatment doctors were giving

McFarlane. "He's feeling OK," said Garment, who did not know how long the retired Marine lieutenant colonel would remain in the hospital. "I just hope he gets well as soon as possible.

Garment said he was angry because McFarlane's testimony before several congressional panels investigating the sale of U.S. arms to Iran and the possible diversion of profits to Nicaraguan Contra rebels has been scrutinized intensely for holes and discrepancies.

"Everyone is picking on what he said," Garment said in an interview. "I think it's unfair because the discrepancies are not really discrepancies," but simply one side of the story because most of the central participants have refused to answer questions. Two of the people reported to be principals in the deal to sell U.S. arms to Iran - Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, a former National Security Council aide, and Vice Adm. John M. Poindexter, the ex-NSC chief invoked their constitutional right to remain silent when called to testify on Capitol Hill. McFarlane was to make his second appearance before the Tower commission the day he was rushed to the hospital suffering from the drug overdose. Asked if McFarlane was angry about being the only one so far to volunteer to talk, Garment said, "I don't think so." He added: "I

McFarlane, who was national security adviser until he resigned in December 1985, and others have testified that he was involved in the earliest stages of the plan to sell arms to Iran.

Firm to offer scholarship for 'innovative acoustical design'

By KIM GREER Collegian Reporter

Students in the colleges of Architecture and Design, Arts and Sciences, and Engineering can win a scholarship to the tune of $400 for creating an innovative acoustical design or structure.

Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design, said the architecture firm of Coffeen, Anderson, Fricke and Associates in Lenexa is offering the scholarship as an incentive for students to specialize in acoustic design.

"(The firm) specializes in the creation of marvelous facilities" in acoustical design, Lapping said. In addition to architecture, the firm works in the engineering and design

"(Just) like some physicians are general practitioners, some architecture firms are general practitioners," Lapping said. "Some physicians are specialists. (This firm's) speciality is acoustics.

The term acoustics refers to the sound environment and the quality of built structure with respect to sound. The shape of a structure and the materials used to build the structure affect the acoustic quality.

Robert Coffeen, a member of the firm, came to K-State to speak about sound environments. Lapping said Coffeen was impressed with the architectural work done at K-State and that he wanted to encourage students in the area of acoustics. Coffeen's firm decided to fund a tuition scholarship for students in colleges that have some involvement with acoustic design and theory

"Commitment and sincerity are a very important part of (the selection)," Lapping said.

The scholarship winner will be chosen by a three-member faculty committee

Acoustic theory has applications in areas such as theater and speech. Moreover, acoustics can affect the quality of education. Any student who has attended classes in large lecture halls is affected by the acoustic quality of the room, Lapping said.

Lapping, who is completely deaf in one ear and partially deaf in the other, said the College of Architecture and Design stresses the importance of being sensitive to the needs of people with handicaps.

Students applying for the scholarship must provide a current academic transcript, a list of activities relevant to acoustics and a statement of no more than 250 words about the student's interest in acoustics.

Survey Results

Each year Campus Crusade for Christ conducts a number of National Collegiate Opinion Surveys to help us determine the religious thinking of students at KSU. The purpose of the survey is twofold: (1) to help determine and understand current religious thinking on campus, and (2) to share with those who are interested what a personal relationship with Jesus Christ means to us. The students and staff of Campus Crusade for Christ wish to thank those students who have participated in giving their opinion.

Here are some of the results of the survey. They reflect the opinion of 176 students and are part of a study of more than 2,000 students over the past three years. Because of space, only major percentages are given (percentages are rounded off).

Officials' story ever-changing

Scissors in position? Get ready to clip, KSU Police Department. Surely this column will merit entry into the literature file that "doesn't exist."

The literature file in question is only one in a series of inconsistencies in K-State police officials' statements concerning the photographing of and record-keeping on certain campus groups. The existence of a campus "intelligence file" has outraged faculty and students and left many questioning the integrity of their police officials. Events last Friday did little to quiet this

Last Friday, faculty and students were allowed to view the police file before its destruction, which was ordered by Vice President of Administration and Finance George Miller.

Lyman Baker, instructor in English and sponsor of Students in Solidarity with Central America (SISCA), the group most recently photographed, examined the file at 10:30 a.m. Friday. Baker asked Police Inspector Richard Herrman if there were any other files of photographs or literature from campus groups. "No," Herrman answered.

When Janet Weddle, senior in computer science, visited the police department at 1:30 p.m., she got a different response - one so startling that she wrote down exactly what occurred after she left the department.

Her notes read: "(Inspector) Herrman asked me if I knew that the morning of the 'Anti-Contra Aid' protest there were posters 'all over campus' which read 'Impeach Reagan.' I said that I was not aware of this, so he opened a file cabinet and took out an announcement of the demonstration clipped to the pamphlets which were handed out at the no literature file exists and then produces it for another, public trust in the institution of law enforcement is seriously hampered.

Even more disturbing is Herrman's implication that the slogan "Impeach Reagan" justifies police surveillance. The slogan was not "Assassinate Reagan" or "Overthrow Reagan," which are both illegal actions. Impeachment is a legal action guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by the Con-

On the other hand, the two groups that overtly promoted violence and illegal activities last semester were completely ignored by the police. Pi Sigma Epsilon, a marketing honorary, helped to incite a riot by selling "What a Riot!" T-shirts before the K-State-University of Kansas football game. The American Nuclear Society urged the detonation of a nuclear weapon on a neighboring city by peddling "Nuke KU!"

Superintendent of Police Charles Beckom said the police only photograph groups which have a history of violence. Anti-abortion groups are known to set bombs and yet the police did not photograph the anti-abortion march last month. SISCA, which was photographed, has no history of illegal ac-photographs were destroyed when the surveillance controversy began. The remaining photographs were all of peaceful groups: a 1972 peace march, a 1985 "Atom Bomb" protest which consisted of eight good friends milling in front of the Union without signs or literature, and a 1986 American Farm Movement protest, complete with license plate photographs of those involved. According to Herrman, farmers asked the police to take such pictures and keep them on file.

The other major discrepancy in police statements is whether the police share its files with outside agencies. On Jan. 29, Hermann said it did. On Feb. 5, he retracted that statement. On Feb. 6, department officials told Orma Linford, professor of political science, that when investigating a potential employee, the FBI has the right to look at files. On Feb. 9, Beckom told the Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations that information is shared with the FBI.

The implications of campus police routinely recording the activities of select lawful groups are vast and should be discussed at length in a public forum. The implications of a police department whose story changes from day to day, hour to hour are equally

On Feb. 23, the Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations will discuss the policy of an "intelligence file" at a meeting in the Union. Perhaps, by then, the police department will have a consistent story

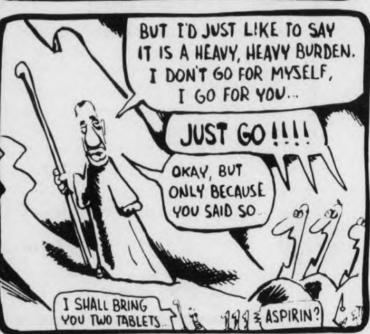

The administration, by demanding that all files be destroyed, should be commended for its swift action and firm stand on this issue of basic civil rights. Hopefully, the council will follow the administration's lead and opt to keep law enforcement out of the business of political oppression.

You better believe money talks

As a child, money had little or no effect on me. I went about my daily routines unscathed by a changing economy, only concerned with watching cartoons and running the timber with a Collie pup named Friskey. With growing up, however, came an increased awareness of the importance of currency to society. Soon I realized these interestingly decorated paper sheets could be traded for goodies beyond my wildest dreams. Of course, that wasn't much for a boy of 51/2. I also learned that the brown colored coins tasted bad but the bubble gum they could be traded for was ever so sweet.

I could often be found leaning against the counter in the grocery store with my hand in the air begging for my mom's lose change. A scene, I might add, not uncommon among my closer friends, even today. Once I reached the experienced age of 8, I had become an ornery and shrewd businesskid, saving my money for large purchases like a wind-up car or a cap gun. It was somewhere between puberty and 11th grade that I lost my competitive edge and became an investment risk. No longer did my parents freely hand out money to me for school supplies. No longer were lunch tickets paid for in

It was a transitional time in my life, when my attitude changed from a stingy hoard to a penniless patron of numerous goods and services. Now I find that when I have money I am driven by an incredible urge to spend it.

Actually I don't like to spend money, at least not in large amounts. I'll find myself spending cash on little items like greeting cards, pens and dollar pitchers. Unfortunately, I usually am trying to gather up extra cash rather then spend it. If money came to us as easy as it goes, I'd spend a lot more of it. Despite the fact the money situation is tight, I still have bad habits like doughnuts, phone calls and buying three new shirts a

I find it wild to think how ancient tribes used rocks or beads for currency thousands of years ago. I have enough trouble getting a Coke machine to work the way it is, much less if I stuffed a rock down it. It's nice to know we invented a better system of currency. Maybe it isn't better. Have you ever gotten a counterfeit rock? "Hey, this isn't a rock, it's a petrified turtle egg. Mathematics has never been one of my strong points and neither has record keeping. Oh, I usually have a reasonable idea of the balance, but I figure the bank will probably remind me when I need to consider steady work again. I've known people who kept precise ledgers with even the smallest transactions recorded. I can't think of any offhand, but

I'm sure I know at least one. My records fluctuate somewhere between grossly inaccurate and practically devoid. I thank modern technology, however, for allowing me to have my entire financial inventory at my fingertips at all times. Honestly though, I don't think it took many brains to insert a scratch-pad in a checkbook. The type of records I keep correlates directly to the time and place the check is written. For example, a check written to Dillon's at 10:09 p.m. may have the amount and place scribbled down but under no circumstances will the date, check number or forwarding balance be noted. A transaction with a car dealer at 2:47 p.m. is recorded religously, in ink. A check written to Kite's for $10.10 at 1:16 a.m. is not mentioned, just in case my mother happens upon my checkbook.

Ideally, canceled checks are to be crossreferenced with ledger entries. I did that once. I never know what to do with canceled checks. Lately I have been safely filing them away in a safe-deposit box. It's a handsome little item - at least it will be as soon as I tape some wrapping paper over the NIKE.

I am probably very lucky in that I have a very understanding banker who feels sorry for me. He knows if he doesn't handle my account there isn't another bank within reach of civilization that will. My account jumps back and forth from red to black so much the bank's record sheet on me looks like a checker board. I dream about having money a lot these days. It's nice to think of all the things I would do with a million dollars; the list is smaller, however, than it was four years ago. More important though are the things I wouldn't do with a million dollars: I wouldn't wear the same clothes so often or do laundry so much. I wouldn't drink as much Always Save cola. I wouldn't ask as many questions in class because there is a real good chance I wouldn't be there Someday if riches come my way, I'm sure I will have the same problems then as now. Because when I've used my Visa until it's melted around the edges, I'm sure I'll lean back in my chair and think, "This is just like old times.

Study given to state officials identifies possible waste sites

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - A comprehensive study of the state's involvement in the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact was distributed Wednesday to members of the Legislature, detailing all options and background on what has become the surprise issue of the 1987 session.

The nearly 50-page report was prepared by the Department of Health and Environment as the Legislature begins to dig into the issue of the compact and decide whether it wants to pull out of the agreement.

"The present circumstances find Kansas at an important crossroad," the report said. "It is important to explore the various alternatives currently available to this state." The report does not make any recommendations. It simply lays out all the history behind Kansas' decision in 1982 to join the five-state pact and the options for withdrawing. The compact is an association of five states - Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana - created as a means of finding one central location for a regional radioactive waste dump.

The five states signed the compact agreement in 1982 and it was ratified by Congress in 1985. An environmental consultant was hired to identify areas in the five states suitable for a disposal facility capable of holding 5 million cubic feet of low-level radioactive waste.

Lawmakers believe they must decide this session whether to remain in the compact because Congress has set a 1988 deadline for compacts to designate a host state and the disposal facility must be in operation by 1993.

According to the report, the list of geologically suitable areas for locating the waste dump has been narrowed down to include: 18 counties in Kansas, 10 in Nebraska, two in Arkansas and one in Louisiana. The consultant did not find any suitable areas in Oklahoma for a radioactive waste dump.

In Kansas, the counties considered the best location for a dump are: Atchison, Doniphan, Brown, Jackson, Nemaha, Marshall, Republic, Jewell, Mitchell, Lincoln, Smith, Osborne, Phillips, Rooks, Graham, Gove, Logan and Wallace.

"According to the (consultant's) report, Kansas has more potential sites than the other four compact states. While that fact does not by itelf guarantee that Kansas will be selected as the host state by a potential developer, chances are quite high that Kansas may in fact be

"Kansas and Nebraska appear to be the front-runners for being selected by a developer to locate a low-level radioactive waste disposal facility.'

Unlike other waste compacts, the Central Interstate group did not mandate that the member state which produces the highest volume of radioactive waste be the first choice to host a waste dump.

"Although (waste) volumes generated by the member states have been an important consideration in the selection of a host state in some other compact regions, it cannot be considered as a factor by the Central Interstate Compact Commission in selecting a host state for its regional facility pursuant to our compact law," the report said.

Opponents of the compact have complained at length that it's unfair for Kansas to be the dumping ground for Louisiana, Nebraska and Arkansas, which produce double and triple the amount of waste.

Private companies interested in developing the compact's disposal facility must submit formal applications by April 1 and a developer will be selected by June 1. The compact will make its decision based on the technical design of the proposed facility with emphasis on technology which minimizes public exposure to the waste.

Senators to study SGA revisions, ASK agenda

By MICHAEL MORRIS Collegian Reporter

Associated Students of Kansas will seek approval of the group's prioritized platform at tonight's Student Senate meeting in the Union Big Eight room.

The issues on which ASK will focus are release of fees, enrollment adjustment and state work-study.

Patty Hipsher, senior in political science and campus ASK director, said ASK representatives from five Board of Regents schools decided these issues were most important.

In addition, Senate will hear first reading of five Student Governing Association constitutional and bylaw revisions.

Of those five, one will be a revision moving the election date for the ofdent senators and Board of Student responsible for presenting the budget Publications members to three full weeks before Thanksgiving break.

Howard Woodbury, junior in animal sciences and industry, will sponsor an SGA by-laws revision limiting the time a petition can be circulated to 60 school days.

Library funding cuts slow book exchange

From Staff and Wire Reports

Between August and January, Farrell Library exchanged about 3,500 books with other libraries through the Kansas Information Circuit, a network now being discontinued due to Gov. Mike Hayden's budget cuts.

A recommendation from the state budget office has pulled the plug on the multimillion-dollar KIC. Now, computer terminals sit idle and the interlibrary loan system has slowed.

'We regret that this good service to education and the community has been severely reduced," said Dewayne Johnson, librarian for the state library system

KIC died because the state library in Topeka, which financed the network, received a 4.9 percent budget cut and could no longer afford the system, Elder said.

Although "it is a blow to the public library system in Kansas," Farrell Library will be able to function almost as well without the program, said Nelda Elder, interlibrary loan librarian at Farrell Library.

Farrell belongs to OCLC, the national library network for cataloging and interlibrary loans, and has access to most of the same books anyway.

The change has a much more profound effect on public libraries than on the universities, because now public libraries must mail all requests rather than use the computer system, Elder said.

"We will work to keep open a minimal amount of interlibrary loan activity, but we have reverted to the traditional method, which is through the U.S. Postal Service," Johnson said. "And that (method) is very slow. Meanwhile, we are seeking funding to enable the network to reopen."

Before the change, Farrell

Library only paid personnel costs, she said. Now each request will cost $1.27 through the OCLC and will be absorbed by Farrell

The $24,000 cut affects three parts of the centralized system. One part is the updating of the Kansas Union Catalog, a central index containing the 4.7 million holdings, or 1.5 million titles, of the state's community of libraries. The other parts affected are the maintenance of the communications software and entry of new book records into the union

Although librarians aren't quibbling with their responsibility to help reduce the budget, they are questioning the wisdom of dismantling the microcomputerbased network that automatically routes loans between the nearly 300-member libraries.

"This is insanity. Penny-wise and pound-foolish," said Margaret Gates, head librarian at Manhattan Public Library. "It's ridiculous to have an investment of this kind and not be able to tap into it.'

But Phil Anderson, an analyst for the Kansas Division of Budget, didn't agree that the change was

"The library system has already run out of the money needed to do the second yearly addition of the Kansas Union Catalog," Anderson said. "They just didn't have enough money to perform the interlibrary loan

"I think if you looked at the budget documents, you would agree it was a prudent decision."

Last year, Manhattan, which is considered a Resource Core Center, processed 5,000 items shipped out of the library and 2,000 items brought into town from other libraries. Between K-State and the University of Kansas, Gates said more than 3,000 items were exchanged.

New standards increase quality of beef

By SUSAN STAGGENBORG Collegian Reporter

Beef is taking on different names these days. Hamburger will have to meet tougher standards as namebrand beef brings quality to a new

'Branded" beef was developed from the consumer demand for quality beef - meat which is palatable, more lean or produced without any additives.

"Branded beef is a name hung on it by the popular press and coined by people in the business" said Dell Allen, professor of animal sciences and industry.

Branded beef was developed in an attempt to make the commodity into a name product and capture loyal consumers, Allen said.

Although branded beef has not been around for long - the idea behind it has. "Beef has been a commodity, and as a commodity it does not have an identity through the marketplace," Allen said. In the late 1800s, the beef industry was identified with packers, such as Armour Star and Wilson Certified. These packers identified the beef as their own as it went through processing methods.

The movement of government

labeling of beef was not used until World War II, when mandatory beef grading was developed, to supply the troops with the product," Allen said.

This movement toward government interaction is what constituted a consumer demand for government branded and certified beef. Individual consumers rely on governnment labeling now, Allen said.

The first known branded beef program to emerge was the Certified Angus Beef program. This brand of beef is noted for a high palatability or taste quality.

For an animal to qualify for the CAB program, it must meet certain standards set by CAB.

The main standard a carcass must meet, which separates CAB branded beef from others, is that it must be predominately Angus and meet palatability standards. After meeting CAB standards, carcasses must also pass United States Department of Agriculture grading.

Another branded beef concept has emerged to satisfy the healthminded consumer's demand for leaner beef.

The Chi-Lite program boasts the leanness trait in their Chianina breed of cattle. From this same concept, the American Lite Beef program was developed which accepts any breed of cattle that meets the leanness requirements. This program is found primarily in southeast United States.

Recent research and surveys have made consumers aware of the hazards of growth stimulants and additives used in beef production. This has created a demand for natural or organic beef - cattle free of additives.

A program developed for the health conscious is the Maverick branded beef, produced on the Maverick ranch in Idaho. These animals have a known bloodline and are free of growth stimulants.

"The branded beef product is targeted at bigger populations that will buy the product," Allen said These specialty meats are found in the larger urban areas, such as New York City, where consumers are numerous and will purchase a new

The cost of branded beef depends on the brand. The best product tends to sell at a higher than typical price. Competition from the other programs will keep prices from being excessive, Allen said.

"The CAB is highly successful. They have experienced an increase in sales this year, partly because of the desired palatability of the beef,"

'Cats choose perfect night to whip Buffaloes

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

The Wildcats could not have picked a better time to practice their winning ways Wednesday in defeating Colorado, 74-56, in Ahearn Field House.

Not even Coach Lon Kruger could have predicted a better night of Big Eight Conference basketball action. Only two teams stand between the 'Cats and first place in the conference and they both suffered major

In Stillwater, Big Eight leader and eighthranked Oklahoma was upset by intrastate rival Oklahoma State, 66-65. And in Columbia, co-leader Kansas was handed its second conference loss by Missouri, 63-60.

Upon learning there was a possibility that these upsets may occur, Kruger responded, "Whatever happens, happens. We can't change anything here, (but, of course) we would prefer certain things to happen."

Certain things did happen, and with victories against their next two conference opponents, Nebraska and Oklahoma State, the 'Cats could be headed into what could be the crucial point of the season, with match-ups against Missouri, Kansas and Oklahoma.

But after Wednesday's lackluster victory over Colorado, Kruger isn't about to make any predictions.

'We finished it," Kruger said. "I really thought Colorado really whipped us in the first half." It wasn't poor shot selection that plagued the 'Cats in the first half, but ineffective defense which Colorado successfully penetrated throughout the period. Even so, the Buffaloes couldn't carry a lead, trading the honors 10 times in the first 16 minutes

It wasn't until Norris Coleman, high scorer for the Wildcats with 21, hit a three-footer and drew a foul which took him to the line with 3:06 left to play in the half that the 'Cats took the lead. Coleman nailed the free throw and scored four of the last nine points in the half which ultimately put the Wildcats up for

In the second half it was all K-State. Led by combinations that at one time consisted of five reserves and no starters on the floor, the 'Cats outscored the Buffaloes 37-27 for a 74-56 victory.

After the game Kruger blamed the slow early start on the lack of enthusiasm.

"I don't doubt that they didn't get as ready tonight as they got to get ready to play, Kruger said. "But that's ... a mistake and we've got to improve that."

Reserves create enthusiasm in otherwise boring contest

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

One could say the men's basketball game between K-State and Colorado lacked intensity - the Wildcats' concentration level was down, the crowd wasn't enthusiastic and most of the contest was downright boring.

K-State did win, however, by 18 points, 74-56. The game wasn't expected to be close. The Buffaloes have not won a Big Eight conference game this season, and they haven't beat K-State at Ahearn Field House since the 1962-63 season.

The game, however, did not lack in the number of 'Cats who saw action. Every player on K-State's roster who suited up played. K-State's eight reserves tallied 88 minutes of playing time. Lynn Smith, Ron Meyer and Mark Dobbins played 22, 22 and 21 minutes, respectively. Meyer scored eight points, Smith collected three assists and Dobbins snagged four rebounds.

On paper, this may not sound like it was a big difference in the game. In action, it was a different story.

These players sparked K-State's attack and gave the 'Cats the lifts they needed to finish Wednesday's game on the winning

"Ron Meyer was the one who stepped back up there and answered their (Colorado's) fight a little bit for us," K-State Coach Lon

"I thought Mark Dobbins really played well," Kruger said. "He makes us work makes the offense work. He does a tremendous job of realizing what he can do.'

K-State's reserves seem to be doing a good job of realizing what they can do. These players know their roles and accept them. Meyer and Dobbins started the second half, a reward from Kruger for good first-half ef-

Some kids are too proud or not mature enough to realize what they can give and con-tribute." Kruger said. "Those two (Meyer and Dobbins) make my job all the easier.

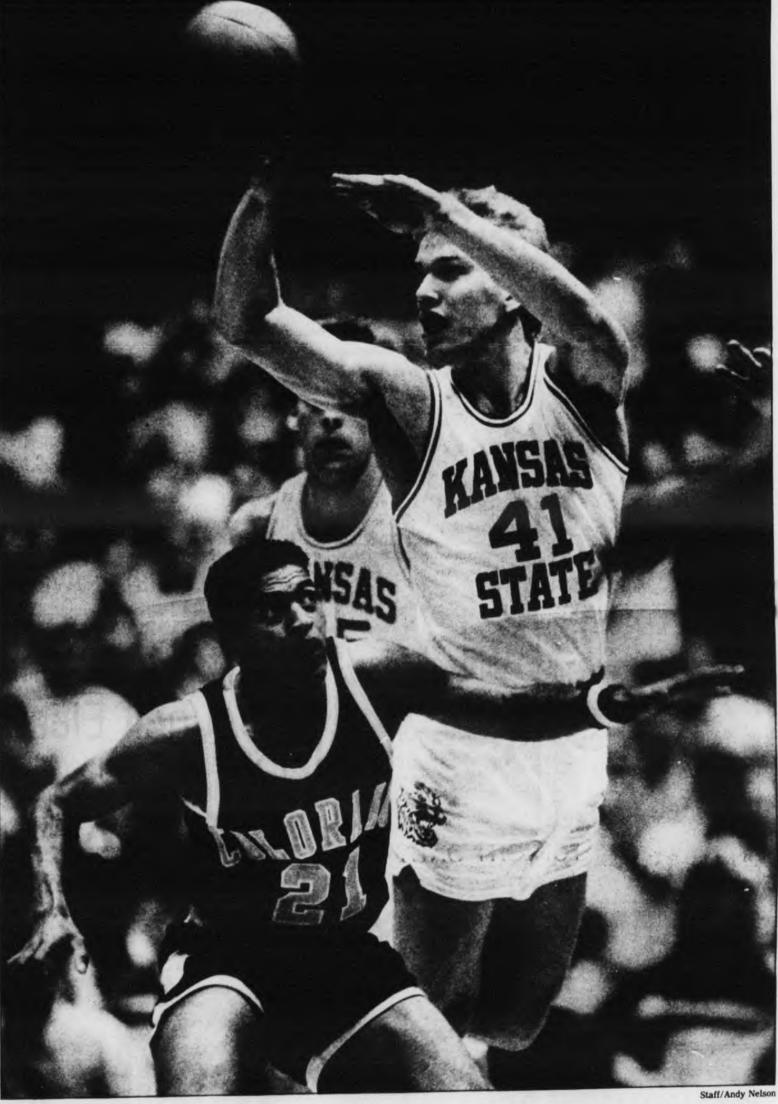

"We believe whoever can get the job done will be out there," said Smith, who gives the Cats quickness and leadership at the point.

"Our starters are our starters," Dobbins said. "Everyone knows their role, and that's what's got us where we are. Everyone knows what's expected of them."

Dobbins credited Kruger for giving 'Cat players the chance to earn playing time. He said experience has been a key factor in making the players feel comfortable on the

"What's so good about our team," Meyer said, "is when the starters come out, they don't think there's going to be a let-down.'

K-State's bench hasn't let anyone down. It is second in the conference in scoring (22.5 points per game) behind Iowa State (23.4 points per game).

K-State guard Mark Dobbins (41) dishes the ball off to a teammate as play during the first half of the Wildcats' 74-56 win over the Buffaloes. University of Colorado guard Michael Lee (24) tries to break up the The win moved K-State to 6-3 in the conference.

Win leaves Lady Cats first in Big Eight

the Lady Cats' 85-78 overtime win Wednesday in Ahearn Field House.

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

K-State's Lady Cats are alone at the top of the Big Eight Conference standings after they pulled out a 85-78 overtime win over the Colorado Lady Buffs last night in Ahearn Field House.

K-State improved to 18-5 overall and 7-3 in the conference. Colorado dropped to 5-5 and 13-10.

Missouri and Oklahoma State were tied with K-State going into this week's games, but Missouri fell to Kansas, 81-79, in overtime and Oklahoma State lost to intrastate rival Oklahoma Tuesday.

Although the Lady Cats survived Colorado's scare, it was not easy. But then again, according to Coach Matilda Mossman, nothing is easy in the Big Eight. She was just happy to get the victory.

"There is never an easy win in this conference," Mossman said. "When push comes to shove, our kids keep coming through."

K-State's defense proved to be the key as it held the high-scoring Lady Buffs to less than 80 points, something Mossman was happy to

"We knew it would be a battle defensively, and I was just happy that we held Colorado to the points we did," Mossman said. "I felt our defense was excellent all night long."

That defense was never more evident than in the overtime period when K-State scored the first nine points in the extra stanza, and Colorado didn't score until the 1:41 mark of overtime.

"In the overtime we were a lot more patient. Once Bridget Turner fouled out, I knew we had it won. She is the key to their whole offense," Mossman said.

said that even though Colorado had made a 14-6 run in the last six minutes of regulation, she believed K-State was going to win when the game went into overtime.

When we got into overtime, we seemed to get our second wind," said Thomas, who broke the Lady Cat single rebound record with 20 caroms. "I felt good and everyone else started to feel good and that was all we needed to get us going."

Thomas said she was not aware of the rebound record.

"I don't know what to say. I didn't being tied for the Big Eight lead is a good feeling and it is giving us even more confidence. K-State saw what appeared to be a comfortable eight-point lead with six minutes left quickly disappear as Colorado ran off six straight points. The Lady Buffs took the lead, 65-63, with 2:09 remaining in regulation on a 16-footer by Gretchen DeWitte.

Susan Green then went coast to coast and scored a layup for the Lady Cats to tie the game with just under two minutes left. Tracy Tripp, who led all scorers with 32 points, gave Lady Cat forward Carlisa Thomas know I was getting that many. But Colorado its final lead of the game as she hit two free throws with 1:19 showing on the clock.

"Tonight was the best night that Tripp has had against us," Mossman said. "She is an offensive machine and when she is on, she is hard to stop. K-State guard Theza Fitzpatrick answered for the Lady Cats as she made both ends of a one-and-one with 57 seconds left. Colorado had a chance to win in the closing seconds, but could not get a 10-footer from the lane to drop with four seconds left. K-State was paced by Sue Leiding, who had 27 points including nine in overtime. Green scored 19 for the Lady Cats, while Thomas and Fitzpatrick chipped in 18 and 10 points, respectively.

Bridget Turner scored 14 for Colorado while DeWitte added 13 points for the Lady Buffs.

K-State plays Saturday at Lincoln against the Lady Cornhuskers. In their last meeting Jan. 14 in Ahearn Field House, the Lady Cats handed Nebraska its first conference loss of asenn 81-76

K-State football team increases size, speed at letter-of-intent day

By The Collegian Staff K-State signed 21 athletes to letters-of-intent Wednesday, including Paul Watson, considered to be one of the top high school quarterbacks in the Midwest this

The 6-foot-2, 180 pound field general from Park Hill High School, Kansas City, Mo., passed for more than 5,000 yards and 52 touchdowns in his varsity career. Watson, also recruited by Boston College, Missouri, Louisville and Florida State, threw for 1,422 yards and 14 touchdowns this past season.

In addition to the 21 athletes signed Wednesday - seven junior college players and 14 prep standouts - 11 junior college transfers had committed during the early-signing period in December.

Parrish had wanted a two-toone split with his junior college to high school signings, and ended up signing 18 juco transfers and 14 prep players.

"With this recruiting class, we have improved our football team depthwise at every position," Parrish said.

"Obviously I am very pleased with the group. We have added a lot of big, physical players. We will definitely be physically stronger and bigger next year. We have also increased our overall team speed."

The list of signees includes seven defensive linemen, five offensive linemen, six defensive backs, four running backs, three defensive ends, two quarterbacks, two receivers, one punter and one inside-linebacker.

The Senate Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee would have examined the fee annually and Senate would have reviewed it every third year to decide whether to change or discontinue the fee.

Bread Basket to erect food storage building

By JEANNETTE O'CONNELL Collegian Reporter

The Flint Hills Bread Basket is expanding with construction of a new building next door to its present loca-

The Bread Basket, 901 Yuma St., received shipment Tuesday of supplies to create a 1,500-square foot building that will house most of the food used to supply food bank agencies in Riley County.

A shed previously on the construction site was demolished Monday. The shed, used to store salt for city streets, was going to be renovated until the building was found to be structurally unsafe, said Atina Hanna, executive director of the Bread Basket.

Cost for the new building will be about $30,000, Hanna said.

The design for the new building was done as a volunteer project by Bruce McMillan, assistant professor of environmental design.

The present structure, which has housed the Bread Basket since its beginning four years ago, will still be in use and will hold commodities from the federal government, such as cheeses and powdered milk, Hanna said.

"It's been a really amazing thing; so many community people have gotten involved," said Tom Mulhern,

The Bread Basket distributed 76,642 pounds of food in 1986 through the food bank program, and served 6,148 people in the Riley County area. The other programs, USDA Surplus Commodities and the Holiday Food Program, reached an additional 11,000 people with 130,000 pounds of food.

The agencies to receive food are selected through the help of Social and Rehabilitation Services in Manhattan. Agencies picking up food monthly consist of churches, crisis centers, youth centers, fellowship halls, developmental centers and low-income apartments for the elderly, as well as other community emergency shelters.

Food donations come from all over the community, Hanna said. Grocery stores, community organizations, individuals and campus organizations are some of the food donors.

The Mayor's Christmas Tree drive was also part of the Holiday Food Program.

Money for the Bread Basket project comes from contributions and fund raising in the community. The program also has a challenge grant in which a certain amount of money is raised and matched by the national foundation in Oklahoma.

Benoit, Bradley to vie in presidential run-off

Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, plans for the student body president run-off election after Rich Perkins, right, election committee member and sophomore in mechanical engineering, told her she was a finalist.

Wants 'best cabinet' she can find

By JUDY GOLDBERG Staff Writer

Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, went to sleep last night with butterflies in her stomach.

Benoit was awakened by a housemate this morning to find that she had earned enough votes in the student body presidential election to place her in the run-off Wednesday,

"I was so nervous last night I was dying," she said. Results of the election were not tabulated until Thursday morning because of a computer program malfunction Wednesday night. Benoit attained 35 percent of the presidential vote with 1,225. Benoit's opponent is Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science, who earned 42 percent of the votes with 1,476. Brett Bromich, senior in marketing, received 802 votes or 23 percent of Winning the run-off will depend on Benoit's final campaign efforts, she

"If I am going to get it, it's going to take a lot of work this week," she said. "I feel like it's just starting all over again."

Benoit attributes her recent victory to efforts in "getting out and speaking to people" at various living groups. Students seemed particularly interested in her proposal to inform them of issues weekly on KSDB and in Collegian editorials, she said. Benoit's first priority, if elected, will be to appoint a diverse yet cohesive group of cabinet members. "I'm going to start finding the best cabinet that I can," she said. Benoit said she would restructure the cabinet to include University, student government and community liaisons. The change would give the members a better definition of their position which would enable them to work more effectively than past cabinet members, she said.

Win or lose, Benoit said she will continue efforts to form a freshman and off-campus student council, a project she has been working on as a student senator this year.

Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science, finds out he is a run-off candidate for student body president during his microbiology lab Thursday morning.

Plans to keep in 'personal contact'

By BECKY HOWARD Staff Writer

Wearing a white lab coat and sitting amidst test tubes and Bunsen burners in a microbiology lab, Kent Bradley, junior in nutrition science, said he was excited about learning he was in the run-off for student body president.

Due to computer problems in the ballot counting process Wednesday night, Bradley and the other run-off candidate, Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, did not learn the results of the elections until Thursday morning. Bradley received 1,476 votes, Benoit, 1,225, and the third candidate, Brett Bromich, senior in marketing, received 802.

"I'm surprised to be learning about it here in class," Bradley said. 'But I'm really excited about being in the run-off and anxious to keep up my campaigning during the next

"Until the run-off election, I plan to keep in contact with the people I have already gotten to know and get to know more people through personal, informal visitation to various groups," he said.

Bradley said he wasn't exactly surprised he would be in the run-off for the presidential position.

"I have a lot of political experience, and I am very knowledgeable about K-State," Bradley said. "Having been on the alumni board and traveling across

By The Collegian Staff

Kansas talking about the University I think I am very knowledgeable about it.

"People that I have come in contact with seemed to respond to this, and I knew my campaign had probably brought this across to the voters," he said.

Bradley said both Benoit and Bromich ran excellent campaigns, and the three candidates have developed a rapport among each

"All three of us have become good friends and get along really well," Bradley said. "We kept in touch with each other by phone last night during the elections, and when we found out about the result delay, we all went out together.'

Senate proposes constitution revisions

By MICHAEL MORRIS Collegian Reporter

Student Senate heard the first readings on five proposed Student Governing Association constitutional and bylaw revisions Thursday night.

Of those five, one was a revision moving the election date for the offices of student body president, student senators and Board of Student Publications members to three full weeks before Thanksgiving break.

The revision states the change is necessary to provide sufficient time for the Student Senate chair to select the Senate executive committee before the end of the semester.

Sally Traeger, senior in marketing and Senate chairwoman, is sponsoring a constitutional revision allowing a Senate chairperson to be eligible for re-election after serving one

Traeger said the revision is in response to the passage of last week's bill allowing a student body president to be eligible for reelection. She said the two offices are parallel in responsibility, and the same experience for both offices would be beneficial to the efficiency of the office.

Traeger is also sponsoring a revision establishing an SGA treasurer position because no one person represents SGA during the allocation process, she said.

The student body president, Student Senate chair and the coordinator of student activities combined have had to assume the role of SGA representative during alloca-

In other action, Howard Woodbury, junior in animal sciences and industry, answered questions concerning a constitutional revision limiting the time a referendum petition can be circulated to 60 days.

Woodbury said the current bylaws have no limitation to the amount of time a petition can be circulated. Thus, if a petition could be circulated for more than 60 days, it would have no validity.

The Human Ecology Council presented revisions to their constitution and bylaws for Senate's ap-

All these revisions will be voted on during next week's Senate meeting. In addition, Senate approved a special allocation to increase the salary of Jenny Johnston, SGA secretary Senate also approved the Associated Students of Kansas prioritized platform resolution.

The issues on which ASK will focus are release of fees, enrollment adjustment and state work-study.

Spring semester enrollment figures of 18,120 are slightly lower than last spring, but higher than fall figures, according to the University Registrar's office. Last spring, 18,185 students attended K-State. Final enrollment figures, to be reported to the Board of Regents, are compiled on the 20th day of classes.

Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement said enrollment figures this spring are an indication that enrollment is stabilizing.

An increase of about 500 students from last semester's count of 17,630 is partially due to the inclusion of fall enrollme figures for some late-starting off-campus classes, said University Registrar Don Foster.

Reagan proposes insurance coverage

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON Reagan proposed Thursday that Congress protect 30 million elderly Americans "from the worst fear of old age" by enacting insurance covering the devastating costs of catastrophic illness.

Overruling conservative opposition, Reagan recommended that the government cover all hospital and doctor expenses under Medicare after a patient had paid $2,000 out of his own pocket. The extra coverage would add $4.92 a month - $59 annually - to Medicare recipients' $17.90 monthly "Part B" premium.

The program, the result of more than a year's debate within the administration, would not cover longterm nursing home care or expenses such as prescription drugs and eye or dental care.

Reagan's announcement provided momentum for an issue that already has widespread backing on Capitol Hill.

"I think there is a very good chance of legislation," said White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater. "There will be a lively debate but I expect legislation to pass, and I think the Reagan plan will be the basis for that legislation."

Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., the chairman of the House Commerce health subcommittee, said the president's move was "an important first step," but noted the plan leaves out some aspects of health care that are most troubling to elderly Americans, such as costly long-term nursing home care.

"Now we in the Congress will have to make the hard decisions about whether this limited proposal is an adequate response or whether we can do more to assist Americans who are severely ill," Waxman said in a statement. Sen. David Durenberger, R-Minn., the ranking Republican on the Senate Finance Committee's health subcommittee, said, "This is by far a better way for people to protect themselves from catastrophic expenses....The most serious criticism that can be offered of this proposal is that it is far

Led by Attorney General Edwin Meese and the budget director, James Miller, conservatives had fought against the plan as it was being developed, arguing that it relied too much on the government and not enough on the health industry. In the end, Reagan sided with Otis Bowen, the secretary of health and human services and author of 'The proposal I'm announcing today is a giant step forward in helping those who before now would have had to make a choice between financial ruin and death," Reagan said in a speech to junior high school students.

"With the protection that this plan would provide, senior citizens will now be safe from the worst fear of old age - having their life savings taken away to pay the costs for an acute care due to a catastrophic

In a separate, written statement, Reagan said his proposal would "help give Americans that last full measure of security.'

Students select 49 senators in election

Spring enrollment up compared to last fall

By The Collegian Staff

During the Student Governing Association general election, not only were the two presidential run-off candidates determined but four Board of Student Publications members and 49 student senators were elected.

On Tuesday and Wednesday 3,823 votes were cast by the students. The winners are listed below Board of Student Publications

members are: Mike Riley, senior in political science, 1,976 votes; Jada Allerheiligen, junior in journalism and mass communications, 1,882; Laura Johnson, freshman in math education, 1,867; and Judi Walter, junior in journalism and mass communications, 1,731

Student senators for the College of Agriculture are:

Pat Muir, senior in agricultural economics, 223 votes; Mary Sobba, junior in agricultural economics, 213; Scott Shuey, sophomore in preveterinary medicine, 209; Melanie Mainquist, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, 185; and Mike A. Kadel, senior in bakery science,

Student senators for the College of Architecture and Design are: Tony Duncan, sophomore in architecture, 88 votes; Butch Rittmann, junior in architecture, 81; and Mike Noll (write-in), sophomore in

Israelis deny prisoner swap plan

JERUSALEM - The Israeli government said Thursday that reports of a secret deal to swap Arab prisoners held in Israel for foreign hostages in Lebanon was completely baseless.

The statement was in an affidavit given the Supreme Court as sworn testimony by State Attorney Yona Blatman's office. It was the strongest Israeli denial thus far of secret contacts to swap prisoners for hostages.

But it left open the possibility of negotiating a prisoner exchange for Israeli soldiers, seven of whom are listed as captured or missing in Lebanon since 1982.

The affidavit was submitted to the three-judge panel considering whether to hear a suit filed by families of terror victims to bar the government from releasing prisoners convicted of or on trial for ter-

"The reports published in the media and on which the families base their petition are completely baseless," the affidavit said. It apparently responded to a report Wednesday in the Davar newspaper that cited Israeli and U.S. sources in Washington as saying Israel and the United States were negotiating a package deal, involving the International Committee of the Red Cross, to free all foreign hostages in Lebanon.

Seib returns home to visit family

KANSAS CITY, Kan. - Wall Street Journal reporter Gerald F. Seib said Thursday his detention in Iran taught him that his family is the most important thing in his life.

"It put my life into a clear perspective," he said at the Kansas City, Kan., home of his in-laws, Chester and Bernice Rosewicz. "I just wanted to come home first to see my family and then to say thanks." Seib, a native of Hays, Kan., and a graduate of the University of Kansas, was detained by Iranian authorities Jan. 31 after he and other journalists were invited to tour that country. "I was very worried about my family," he said. "It must have been just as bad for them."

Seib said the Iranians asked him mostly about his coverage of Israel and accused him of being a "spy of the Zionist regime." "I thought my articles about Iraq would be the big question," he

Bill redefines water office duties

TOPEKA - The Kansas Water Office would become the central repository for information related to climate, water and soil conditions related as generated by water planning groups across the state under a bill passed Wednesday by the Senate.

The bill, which passed 39-0 and was forwarded to the House, calls for the water office to collect the data on behalf of the water planning areas and use it in revising the state water plan each year.

The water office would coordinate all water research and analyses done throughout the state and develop a "multi-agency water resources management information system."

Group pursues 74 WWII criminals

WASHINGTON - A Nazi-hunting group said Thursday it supplied the Justice Department with names of 74 suspected war criminals who came to the United States following World War II after serving in military units that killed tens of thousands of Jews in Eastern Europe.

Lawyers for the Simon Wiesenthal Center of Los Angeles said they assembled from a variety of sources, including archives in the Soviet Union, the names of the former Lithuanian and Latvian soldiers assigned to units under the control of the Nazi SS.

The Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations will review the names and some of them may already be the subject of OSI inquiries, said Neal Sher, the office's director.

Sher said there will be a thorough review of whatever new leads are contained in the group's list of names. This could lead to in-depth investigations and denaturalization and deportation proceedings, Sher said.

Deliberations begin in Klan trial

MOBILE, Ala. - A federal jury on Thursday began deliberating in a $10 million lawsuit against the United Klans of America that stems from the 1981 killing of a black teen-ager whose body was left hanging in a tree.

A Ku Klux Klansman convicted in the killing three years ago pleaded with the all-white jury to decide in favor of the black victim's family, who brought the suit.

"Return a judgment against me and everything else," said James "Tiger" Knowles, 24, also a co-defendant in the case. U.S. District Judge Alex T. Howard Jr., who presided over the trial that began Monday, sent the case to the jury late Thursday. Knowles was sentenced to life in prison in the killing of 19-year-old Michael Donald. Another Klansman, 32-year-old Henry Francis Hays, was sentenced to death in the case. Knowles testified against Hays at

Survey shows youths drink more

ATLANTA - Only about seven in 100 Americans toss down two or more drinks a day, and such heavy and potentially harmful imbibing is much more likely among men and young people, a federal survey

The national Centers for Disease Control reported Thursday the results of a telephone survey on drinking habits in 21 states and Washington, D.C. Participants were asked in 1985 whether they averaged two or more drinks a day.

Only 7 percent of the 25,221 surveyed drank that much, leading the CDC to conclude that a level of two drinks a day is "higher than that experienced by the large majority of adults."

But survey findings varied significantly when broken down by state, sex or age. More than 10 percent of the men surveyed had two drinks a day, compared to less than 3 percent of the women. In most states, heavy drinking declined noticeably with age. And residents of Illinois were as much as three times more likely to drink heavily than residents of Utah or North Dakota.

Israelis deny prisoner swap plan

JERUSALEM - The Israeli government said Thursday that reports of a secret deal to swap Arab prisoners held in Israel for foreign hostages in Lebanon was completely baseless.

The statement was in an affidavit given the Supreme Court as sworn testimony by State Attorney Yona Blatman's office. It was the strongest Israeli denial thus far of secret contacts to swap prisoners

But it left open the possibility of negotiating a prisoner exchange for Israeli soldiers, seven of whom are listed as captured or missing in Lebanon since 1982.

The affidavit was submitted to the three-judge panel considering whether to hear a suit filed by families of terror victims to bar the government from releasing prisoners convicted of or on trial for ter-

"The reports published in the media and on which the families base their petition are completely baseless," the affidavit said. It apparently responded to a report Wednesday in the Davar newspaper that cited Israeli and U.S. sources in Washington as saying Israel and the United States were negotiating a package deal, involving the International Committee of the Red Cross, to free all foreign hostages in Lebanon.

Seib returns home to visit family

KANSAS CITY, Kan. - Wall Street Journal reporter Gerald F. Seib said Thursday his detention in Iran taught him that his family is the most important thing in his life.

"It put my life into a clear perspective," he said at the Kansas City, Kan., home of his in-laws, Chester and Bernice Rosewicz. "I just wanted to come home first to see my family and then to say thanks." Seib, a native of Hays, Kan., and a graduate of the University of Kansas, was detained by Iranian authorities Jan. 31 after he and other journalists were invited to tour that country. "I was very worried about my family," he said. "It must have been just as bad for them."

Seib said the Iranians asked him mostly about his coverage of Israel and accused him of being a "spy of the Zionist regime." "I thought my articles about Iraq would be the big question," he

Bill redefines water office duties

TOPEKA - The Kansas Water Office would become the central repository for information related to climate, water and soil conditions related as generated by water planning groups across the state under a bill passed Wednesday by the Senate.

The bill, which passed 39-0 and was forwarded to the House, calls for the water office to collect the data on behalf of the water planning areas and use it in revising the state water plan each year.

The water office would coordinate all water research and analyses done throughout the state and develop a "multi-agency water resources management information system."

Student gets military award

'Best soldier' loads tanks

By RITA GRAVES Collegian Reporter

When he isn't toting his books across campus, Walter Coleman loads artillery in Army tanks.

Coleman, freshman in premedicine, received the Kansas State Army National Guard Best Individual Soldier Award of 1986.

"I felt very honored to be chosen to compete for this award," Coleman said.

He said he chose to enter the military because it was his father's career, and it was a good way to earn money during school.

"I love the military; it's the only life I have known," said Coleman. He attends K-State during the week and works for the Guard two weekends every month. As an armor crewman, his duties include loading artillery, checking that artillery is correctly positioned and ensuring that no objects obstruct the path of the tank.

Coleman lives with his parents in Junction City.

"It's difficult to commute back and forth to Manhattan because it leaves very little free time," Col-

Even though he has won the best soldier award at the battalion, brigade, division and state levels, Coleman said he intends to continue competition. His next challenge will be the 5th Army competition, which includes Oklahoma and Texas, for the best soldier award in the region. Coleman will leave March 21 for San Antonio, Texas, to compete at this received on last year's competition, chances are very good that I'll win at this level," Coleman said.

Before winning the best soldier award, Coleman received the Patent Award while he was in basic training at Fort Knox, Tenn. He also received the Army Achievement Medal for going through basic training despite hurting himself

"I guess they thought I showed guts when I stayed and carried out my training (as an armor crewman)," Coleman said.

When Coleman joined the Guard, he started at E-1 level. He is currently at E-3 level. After making it to E-5 level, he may become a sergeant.

A promotion from private to sergeant is an aspiration Coleman doesn't keep private.

"Moving up to become sergeant is very important to me," he said. "Becoming a sergeant will allow me to have more responsibilities and an increase in pay," Coleman

An education at K-State will allow Coleman to pursue his biggest ambition. "My biggest dream is to become a neurosurgeon in the Army," he said. Coleman said the number of Army medical doctors is down 33 percent.

"I am currently enrolled in a three-year pre-med program and hope to become a doctor by 1999," Coleman said.

Coleman plans to make the Army his life because "it was good security for my dad, so it will be good security for me."

Pfc. Walter Coleman was named Kansas Army National Guard Best Individual Soldier of 1986, a statewide honor.

Two students compete for scholarship abroad

By The Collegian Staff

Two K-State finalists for the Fulbright Scholarship are vying for an opportunity to study abroad for a

Julie Sinclair, senior in political science, and Greg Jarrett, graduate student in electrical engineering, have been recommended for the Fulbright Scholarship by the national screening committee of the Institute of International Education making it to the inner circle of competition.

"I'm a little excited," Jarrett said. "I won't know officially until late March or early April. I still have my fingers crossed Sinclair, on the other hand, said she is really starting to count on getting the scholarship.

"It would be such a tremendous experience," she said. "I shouldn't count on it, but I am. If I actually do win it. I'll be bouncing off the walls." Jarrett said if he does get the scholarship he would like to travel to Aachen University or Hannover University, both in the northern part of West Germany. Sinclair said she is setting her sights on the University of Mohammed V, in Morocco. Walter Kolonosky, associate professor in modern languages and study abroad adviser, said both students are doing a benefit to themselves by applying for the scholarship.

"They have both argued that this would definitely enhance their education," Kolonosky said. "It is a chance to study in a foreign country and to learn a whole lot more about the field that the student is interested

However, Kolonosky said if Sinclair or Jarrett is selected, they may not get the school they desire.

"A lot of the time the government will make the final decision as to where the student will study,' Kolonosky said.

Student turnout shows promising new trend

Four weeks into the semester, any election. students have elected 49 student senators and narrowed the student body president field to two candidates.

Total number of votes cast for the Student Governing Association's general election was 3,823, or about 21 percent of the 20th day spring enrollment figure of 18,120.

This was a marked increase from the 1986 election total of 2,778 votes.

Moreover, the election netted the highest number of votes since the 1979 spring elections when 5,615 votes were cast. According highest number of votes cast in couraging.

Compared to previous turnouts, this was a successful election. But the campaigns have not finished.

Wednesday will be the run-off election between Michelle Benoit. junior in agricultural economics, and Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science.

With the exception of the 1970 election, turnouts for run-off elections have been substantially lower. We hope, however, this trend doesn't continue.

The higher turnout may be because of increased voter awareness or because of the to SGA records dating back to the athletic fee referendum. 1970 general election, this was the Whatever the reason, it is en-

Surrogate parent trial tests legal obligations testing for the first time the legality of surrogate parenting. "Baby M" is the pawn in the middle of a custody battle between her biological father and the woman who gave birth to her.

The surrogate mother, Mary Beth Whitehead, signed a contract with William and Elizabeth Stern agreeing to carry a child, fathered by William Stern, for the Sterns.

There can be two issues in this case: a moral and a legal one. The moral issue may be argued as diligently and as often as the abortion issue. However, the legal issue seems to have clear implications.

Whitehead signed a contract a legally enforceable agreement between two or more parties. This contract was signed and an agreement was made. Therefore, it should be legally binding and is a contract.

A trial in Hackensack, N.J., is Whitehead needs to abide by this agreement.

If a court ever decides a contract is not binding, we are all in trouble. This case is two-fold; the surrogate parenting issue is being examined and the legality of contracts is also at stake.

When a person signs a contract, he or she obviously has made a decision on a subject and a second party is also in agreement with this decision. If the person never intended to fulfill the agreement, then the contract never should have been signed.

'Amerika' is a laughable waste

Oooh, kiddies. There's a new horror movie in town. It's not "Halloween 12" or even, thank goodness, "Rocky XIX." No, it's a little epic called "Amerika."

"Topeka, titled Formerly Kansas...USSR," and now billed as "The most talked-about television event of the season." "Amerika" starts Sunday and lasts through 141/2 hours of living hell. This nightmare is not only for the victims in the movie but for the viewer with a shred of intelligence.

Another miniseries. Remember "The Day After?" When everyone laughed ghoulishly because the university up the river evaporated? Don't feel guilty; the paranoid fantasy "Amerika" should provide many more legitimate laughs.

It began in 1984 when several Important People tossed an idea around. After the movie rights to this idea had been bought, a script was put together that posed a few disturbing hypothetical questions.

One: What if the United States of America was invaded?

Two: What if the invaders were Godless Communists?

Three: What if said Soviet and Cuban troops were able to conquer this country without firing a shot because America was filled with Bleeding Heart Liberals and other offensive types?

What if the new government had the United Nations as its goons, a sort of mobile death squad to crush rebellion in the Heartland? (Heartland is used as much as a vague geographical location as an emotional pride point favored by demagogues.)

Five: What if the creators of "Amerika" decided to go ahead and exploit the current wave of nationalism and fear of the Red Menace and blow millions of dollars going overbudget on a hokey, jingoistic made-for-TV movie?

Now that's spooky.

BRAD STUCKY Guest Columnist

"Amerika" portrays this country in 1996, 10 years after the Soviet invasion. Jeff Gottlieb, in the Jan. 1987 issue of "Mother Jones," describes America as "...a deindustrialized nation where crimes and drugs are rampant, farms lie fallow, and skyscrapers have been abandoned." Much of this vague Heartland is a prairie gulag, where former den mothers are sleeping their way to the top of the new heirarchy and U.N. tanks squash shantytowns and intellectuals into submission.

Todd Gitlin, writing in the same issue of 'Mother Jones," states, "'Amerika' is so thoroughly, tub-thumpingly reactionary that one suspects there has to be a commensurately reactionary mind behind it. To start with, the essential plot idea is crackpot hysteria. Indeed, the idea of a Russian invasion of the United States is so nutty that the script barely goes through the motions of trying to explain the premise.'

ABC sees the movie as "a lesson in civics." It becomes apparent, though, that the basic doctrine behind "Amerika" is xenophobia. The miniseries is to be filled with Hitler youth, Orwellian imagery and "good" underdogs fighting "evil" superiority. It's a deadpan Rambo vs. a Totalitarian System movie, and it has everything to make a film successful in the Reagan '80s: emotion instead of realities, the search for a set of mystical old values and a cherished way of life and most important, lots and lots of gratuitous Rational viewers aren't the only ones to be offended by this barely disguised propaganda. The United Nations is not taking kindly to being presented as sadistic bully boys of the Soviets.

Norman Atkins, in the Feb. 12 issue of "Rolling Stone," wrote, "Last March, Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar wrote to Thomas Murphy, chairman of the board at Capital Cities/ABC, asking that the 80-odd negative references to the UN be excised from 'Amerika.'" He called the characterization of UN peace-keeping forces as a Soviet tool a "travesty."

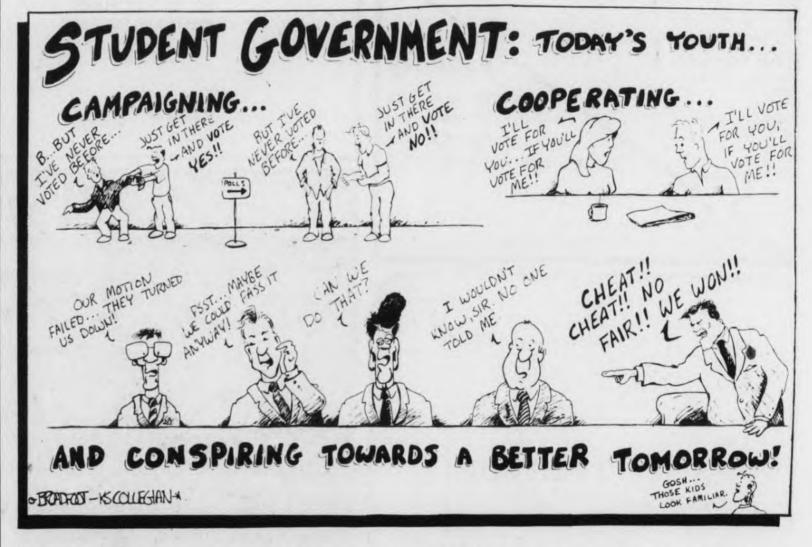

ABC has refused to soften the script. Officials at the network say the point of "Amerika" is "to make us think about what our values are and about the responsibilities of being an American.'

So what, the critics ask. No one ever asked for a boycott on "Godzilla," and that was make-believe as well. But "Amerika" is different. It smacks of the irrationality of the Cold-War atmosphere. It's true, you hardly ever see backyard bomb shelters anymore, but the movie is more subtle than that. Gitlin called it "just as contradictory and just as coherent as Reaganism itself. In 'Amerika,' all God's children get to serve the greater glory of the national superstate by fighting to redeem the little house on the prairie."

Watch the movie, if you can stomach it, and make your own decisions. The greatest danger is to us, the students and those under 25, who largely grew to maturity and political awareness under the Reagan regime. Many are still impressionable and awed by the power and glory of the new

Myself, I'd rather watch an old godzilla flick for a different sort of mindless entertainment.

Public decides TV's successes

The medium of television receives its share of comment, good and bad. Even those who work within the medium take potshots at their own industry from time to time. It is a business we are all concerned about every day of our lives. Most traditional college students cannot conceive of life without TV.

So it's only proper that this ever-pervasive medium is once again the subject of media scrutiny. (The term "once again" is probably unnecessary. I doubt if TV is ever NOT under some type of scrutiny from someone, somewhere.)

No, I'm not referring to ABC's miniseries, "Amerika." I'm going to reserve comment on that one until I see it. At this point the hype is getting to me, so I'm choosing to ig-

The two topics I'd like to address are of a more technical nature, rather than programming or political.

Colorization is the addition of color to a black and white film. Through the use of computers, old classics (or not-so-classic old films) can now be seen in technicolor on TV.

The technique is still in its infancy. You can definitely tell when a film has been colorized - the colors aren't quite true, they don't quite match the picture and it just doesn't look right. It looks fake in other words. But the industry is still insisting on using the technique, particularly on very popular shows. "Wanted Dead or Alive" starring Steve McQueen or "The Maltese Falcon" with Humphrey Bogart or James Cagney's "Yankee Doodle Dandy" are just a few examples.

In a TIME magazine Essay, published Jan. 12, the president of Colorization Inc. is quoted: "People don't like black and white. When we color it, they buy it."

I hope that's only true as a passing fad and not as a future trend.

The artistic part of the film industry is outraged. A large number of actors, directors, writers and other artists have spoken out against the technique. They aren't outraged because of physical damage to a film - the color is added to a tape of the original - but with the principle of the thing. They argue the addition of color destroys the cultural and artistic value of a film. Since the finished film was intended to be in black and white, many of the filming and lighting techniques were specifically geared for that end. The current filmmaking community argues the artists of yesterday knew what they were doing, so why tamper with the intended finished product? I have to agree with the protest of the technique. If a film was originally done in black and white, why add color? I don't mind watching those shows; I don't have to have color to enjoy a picture. In fact, black and white is a nice change from the barrage of technicolor the industry sends at us. Hopefully, the public will let the industry know colorization isn't necessary and allow us to keep watching the classics (and not so classics) in the manner in which they were intended to be watched.

Another TV gimmick even more controversial than colorization is interactive

The toy manufacturers are currently hawking their wares for next Christmas. Retailers have to decide now what the major toys for the upcoming year are going to be. Within a few months, children will begin to see the advertisements telling them what they really want for Christmas or their birthday this year.

Interactive toys have just barely reached the store shelves and already they are creating an uproar. Activist groups such as Action for Children's Television and parents groups are protesting the effects of interactive toys.

An interactive toy is one that will respond electronically to a signal emitted from the television during a specially produced program. The exact method of doing this is beyond me at the moment. I'll have to see it to understand it.

But the protest concerns the type of action the children and the toys are interacting with. Usually the show has something to do with space/future/danger. The toy either is aimed at the screen and responds to the action taking place or is placed on the floor and reacts to another toy along with the child.

One set of toys includes robots that will also respond to a keyboard or control panel similar to a video game.

It is another point in the continuing argument concerning the amount of violence on children's television. A soundbite used during a national network report on the toys is a prime example of why some people think there is too much violence.

The reporter asked one boy, about 6 or 7, participating in the testing of the toys, what he thought about killing. The little boy replied it was fun because he liked to win.

It's a shame our children have to equate killing with winning, but in this context that is what they are doing.

The Federal Communications Commission has chosen to reserve judgment on the toys, waiting to see how the public reacts. The FCC attitude is one of letting the marketplace decide. Probably a smart choice, considering this controversy promises to be very emotional and strident on both sides. But the FCC is right - ultimately the public and the marketplace will decide. The industry believes the public will only buy color and will only purchase toys that will interact with the TV and the child. I hope we can finally convince those in the industry we have more sense and intelligence than they think we do.

MOSCOW - Security agents beat protesters and used snowplows to drive them off a Moscow street Thursday, the fourth day of rallies seeking the release of Jewish activist Josef Begun.

Police briefly detained 14 people, including Begun's wife and son.

The agents, who wore civilian clothes, also roughed up Western reporters and television crews covering the protest, which drew about 20 people at Moscow's Arbat shopping

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov later told reporters that young toughs, not security agents, were responsible for breaking up the protest.

However, it was clear at the scene that the plainclothesmen were not teen-age vigilantes. They were wellorganized and were backed by uniformed police and snowplows.

All of those detained - seven at the protest site and six on their way there - were released after a few hours. Six were fined $77 for "petty hooliganism." Police also briefly detained a Western correspondent.

The protesters, many of them Jews, had been gathering daily at the Arbat mall since Monday. They demand to be allowed to emigrate and call for the release of Begun, a Hebrew teacher who was sentenced in October 1983 to seven years in prison for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

A few of the demonstrators held up signs that read: "Free Josef Begun' and "Let Us Go To Israel."

The security agents quickly grabbed them and turned them over o uniformed police. The agents also punched and kicked Western camera crews and reporters who tried to photograph the protest.

Uniformed police officers, normally quick to break up any street violence, did not make a move against the "civilians" who beat up the demonstrators and reporters.

Police detained Hartwig Nathe, a correspondent for the West German news agency DPA, for about 45 minutes and confiscated his film. Meanwhile, half a dozen people in civilian clothing photographed and filmed the protest without interference from police.

Begun's wife, Inna, and Tanya Edelshtein, whose husband Yuli is serving a three-year sentence on a drug possession conviction, were among those detained first.

Begun's son, Boris, raised a placard saying "Free my father, Josef Begun," and was taken away by six men who punched and slapped him as they walked.

The protesters, many of them Jews, had been gathering daily at the Arbat mall since Monday. They demand to be allowed to emigrate and call for the release of Begun, a Hebrew teacher who was sentenced in October 1983 to seven years in prison for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Authorities did not interfere with the demonstrations on Monday and Tuesday, but on Wednesday plainclothes agents shoved the protesters off Arbat Square.

A small snowplow began circling the demonstrators, forcing them to move back and forth across the mall.

Authorities later used that snow plow and a larger one to help herd the protesters off the square. Men in plainclothes walked with them, attacking protesters who strayed and shoving them back into the group.

A few of the demonstrators held up signs that read: "Free Josef Begun' and "Let Us Go To Israel."

The security agents quickly grabbed them and turned them over o uniformed police. The agents also punched and kicked Western camera crews and reporters who tried to photograph the protest

Uniformed police officers, normally quick to break up any street violence, did not make a move against the "civilians" who beat up the demonstrators and reporters.

Police detained Hartwig Nathe, a correspondent for the West German news agency DPA, for about 45 minutes and confiscated his film. Meanwhile, half a dozen people in civilian clothing photographed and filmed the protest without interference from police.

Begun's wife, Inna, and Tanya Edelshtein, whose husband Yuli is serving a three-year sentence on a drug possession conviction, were among those detained first.

Begun's son, Boris, raised a placard saying "Free my father, Josef Begun," and was taken away by six men who punched and slapped him as they walked

Another group of plainclothesmen scuffled with protesters as Begun was being detained. One of the agents chanted "Jews, Jews" in German. A few passers-by shouted, "Go back to work" and "Stop dirtying our streets.

Two Players reach finals of drama fest

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

Two K-State theater students advanced to the finals of the American College Theatre Festival during the Irene Ryan Competition in Iowa City, Iowa, Jan. 21 and 22. Finalists Elizabeth Sherby, junior in theater, and Nancy Sloan, senior in theater, were among 12 of 120 student performers to reach the final round. Sherby advanced with her performance in a cut from "Oklahoma!" and Sloan advanced with her cut from "The Constant Wife.' Dan Shea, senior in radiotelevision, Kelli Wondra, graduate student in theater, and Penny Cullers, senior in theater, also competed at the festival.

There are three rounds in the competition - preliminaries, semi-finals and finals. Shea and Cullers were among 33 finalists to compete in the semi-finals. They did not advance to the final round.

Brad Atchison, junior in preprofessional physical therapy, was awarded $50 for best scene partner at the competion. Atchison was Sloan's partner.

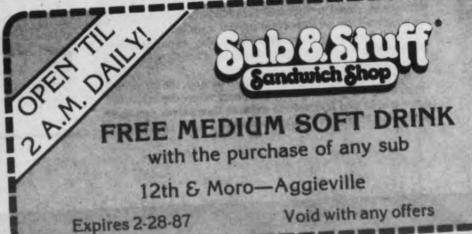

The students prepared sixminute pieces for the competition, Nichols said. One piece of material could be a monologue and one piece had to be a scene with a partner, he said. Each actor in the competition selected a scene partner to bring to the festival.

Sloan's talent also was recognized by an agent from Los Angeles judging the competition, Nichols said. "(The agent) called us last Tuesday (Feb. 2), and wanted Nancy in Los Angeles on Tuesday for an audition." Sloan auditioned for a part in a new soap opera, "The Bold and Beautiful," he said.

The Irene Ryan Foundation of Encino, Calif., awards scholar-ships to outstanding student performers at each ACTF regional festival.

Other states competing at the regional festival were Missouri, Iowa and Nebraska. The foundation and ACTF will send the 12 regional winners and their acting partners to Washington, D.C., in April for the national festival at the Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts.

MOSCOW - Security agents beat protesters and used snowplows to drive them off a Moscow street Thursday, the fourth day of rallies seeking the release of Jewish activist

Police briefly detained 14 people, including Begun's wife and son.

The agents, who wore civilian clothes, also roughed up Western reporters and television crews covering the protest, which drew about 20 people at Moscow's Arbat shopping

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov later told reporters that young toughs, not security agents, were responsible for breaking up the protest.

However, it was clear at the scene that the plainclothesmen were not teen-age vigilantes. They were wellorganized and were backed by uniformed police and snowplows.

All of those detained - seven at the protest site and six on their way there - were released after a few hours. Six were fined $77 for "petty hooliganism." Police also briefly detained a Western correspondent.

Director's Chair

o Kate Anderson, associate professor of theater, communicating and creating an atmosphere open to expression are important in theater. She should know. She's Anderson has taken charge of productions for the past 18 years. She is currently directing the K-State Players in "Tomorrow From Any Window," a play written by Jean-Claude Grumberg. The play is presented by K-State Players and the Department of Speech, with performances Feb. 12-14 and 18-21 in Nichols Theatre. Curtain is at 8 p.m.

"I always enjoyed the process (directing) more than I looked forward to the performance," Anderson said. That was a clue for her to concentrate more on directing than ac-

Before coming to K-State seven years ago, Anderson directed and taught in Vermont and also at the University of Connecticut, Storrs. She is involved with directing at least two plays a year at K-State.

"Directing in the academic theater is interesting because you can see growth in student performers. Students grow both mentally and artistically with each performance," she Anderson likes directing because "for a period of time you have a chance to shape your version or interpretation of a work." A director brings his or her own vision to the play while directing it, although directors try to stay true to the "A director needs to stay open to how the characters will eventually illuminate the play, and give the actor freedom to explore the character," she said. "It is important to stay open to lots of different aspects about the actors because if you can stimulate their own discovery and create a kind of atmosphere where an actor can grow and can discover, it is much more successful than to impose my preconceived idea of actually how I want this character to be.

Experience and gender affect the outcome of a play and how it will be directed and perceived. Women directors might see a play differently than a man would, she said. A woman director might interpret or understand a character or play differently because of experiences they've had relating to the character or play. Just as directors perceive plays differently, so does the audience, because of different experiences and backgrounds, Anderson said. Modest when speaking of her work, Anderson stressed that theater is not a solo art form.

Everyone brings unique experiences to a production, she said. There are so many people involved with making a production come to the final stage: The cast, lighting technicans, sound technicans, makeup artists and costume designers all are an important part of a production.

"Many people interact to make a play come together. Designing and acting is a nice mix of interacting with people and yourself," she said.

"Because acting is an expression of oneself, the director is responsible for creating an atmosphere where the actors are comfortable and feel safe to express themselves and their particular character," Anderson said. "Each performer is different, and you need to be flexible and understanding to the different aspects of the character.'

Anderson enjoys directing plays that are challenging both for the director and actor. "I like directing plays that I think have something to say and a reason for doing it, but at least it's a message or idea or a question that appeals to me on an intellectual level as well as on an emotional and artisitic level.

"When it works, and everything comes together it's really exciting," Anderson said. A director needs to be comfortable with the choices made while directing a play.

"You can't direct for everyone, you can only direct wiyou see. You can't please everyone or you end up not ple ing anyone," she said.

Anderson considers the ideal actor to be one who disciplined and supportive of others.

"All actors are at risk because they expose and exprthemselves to the fullest developing their character. Act need to create an atmosphere where they feel comforta enough with each other to express themselves. Some of favorite actors are the ones I work with," Anderson said

Robert Burnham, a professor in the Department of Architecture since 1976, has been selected as head of the department.

Burnham's appointment coincided with the start of spring semester, said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design. Burnham succeeds Ron Hess, professor of architecture, who stepped down from administrative duties to return to teaching.

"Bob brings a wealth of experience from the classroom as well as the confidence of the architecture faculty to his new position," Lapping said. "My en-thusiasm for his leadership is matched only by his enthusiasm for the program and for the responsibilities which are before him."

Burnham said he is excited to be chosen as the new department

"I view it as a challenge and plan on fine-tuning the curriculum," Burnham said.

He said he hopes to add new courses such as environmental behavior, economic development and programming. He is also working on a program that will allow seniors to work on actual projects in Kansas City.

In addition to architectural design, Burnham taught building construction systems. Burnham has recently been working on a project concerning affordable housing.

Burnham is a native of Cortland, N.Y., and has been a practicing architect in Pittsburg, Pa., and Albany, N.Y. He was also on the architecture faculty of Carnegie-Mellon University from 1969 to 1975.

Movie's web holds viewer in suspense

By ANDRE KELLEY Collegian Reviewer

Debra Winger has certainly stretched herself as an actress. She caught our attention as a bawdy cowgirl in "Urban Cowboy" housewife in "Terms of Endearment." And after playing an oddball lawyer in "Legal Eagles" she's now back as a cunning federal agent in the thriller "Black Widow.'

This time, Winger's playing a shrewd Justice Department agent named Alex Barnes who is on a case involving three wealthy men. All have died under questionable conditions and all with younger wives who vanish afterward.

Alex trails a mysterious woman who not only turns out to be all three widows, but has liquidated all of the dead men's estates. With the help of a shady detective and some very sly moves, she finally locates the widow, who is now using the name Renny.

Theresa Russell (no pushover either) plays the widow and is ab solutely ruthless as she polishes of husbands quicker than Zsa Zsa Gabor.

Alex takes the case quite seriously. She feels somewhat responsible for not warning the last husband, whom she had met briefly while tracking the widow.

She deduces that the only way to trap this woman is to play by her rules, on her turf, using every available edge. This includes changing her own name and befriending Renny even to the point of making love with Renny's husband-to-be in a last-ditch effort to warn him.

The two become locked in battle. with Alex trying to save Renny's husband and end the widow's killing spree while staying out of the widow's web. Or so we're led to

The strengths of "Black Widow" lie in its unique and strangely empathic characters. Alex is paradoxial in that her passion to nab her culprit is almost as strong as her unspoken affinity for her. In one very stong scene, you can feel See WIDOW, Page 7

MOSCOW - Security agents beat protesters and used snowplows to drive them off a Moscow street Thursday, the fourth day of rallies seeking the release of Jewish activist Josef Begun.

Police briefly detained 14 people, including Begun's wife and son.

The agents, who wore civilian clothes, also roughed up Western reporters and television crews covering the protest, which drew about 20 people at Moscow's Arbat shopping

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov later told reporters that young toughs, not security agents, were responsible for breaking up the protest.

Widow

Continued from Page 6 her frustration as she interviews husband No. 3, wanting to warn him but unable to at the risk of blowing her cover. You'll be completely absorbed as you find yourself not even thinking of the morality of Renny's behavior, but wondering, as Alex does, "...she mates, she kills...but does she love?" Renny is enthralling as she goes from husband to husband and fortune to fortune eliminating both the men and their assets. Despite the money, the widow really believes she loved all these men and that somehow, it's her duty to destroy them. The film's biggest flaw is that it never really discloses her true motive for killing so many men or even her true identity. But this is all forgivable given that the script and its characters are so compelling and strong.

Its suspense, intrigue, believability and a couple of great twists will leave you wanting more. "Black Widow" is definitely worth its sting.

New head takes up reins in architecture department

By The Collegian Staff

Robert Burnham, a professor in the Department of Architecture since 1976, has been selected as head of the department.

Burnham's appointment coincided with the start of spring semester, said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design. Burnham succeeds Ron Hess, professor of architecture, who stepped down from administrative duties to return to teaching.

"Bob brings a wealth of experience from the classroom as well as the confidence of the architecture faculty to his new position," Lapping said. "My enthusiasm for his leadership is matched only by his enthusiasm for the program and for the responsibilities which are before

"I view it as a challenge and plan on fine-tuning the curriculum," Burnham said.

He said he hopes to add new courses such as environmental behavior, economic development and programming. He is also working on a program that will allow seniors to work on actual projects in Kansas City.

In addition to architectural design, Burnham taught building construction systems. Burnham has recently been working on a project concerning affordable

MOSCOW - Security agents beat protesters and used snowplows to drive them off a Moscow street Thursday, the fourth day of rallies seeking the release of Jewish activist

Police briefly detained 14 people, including Begun's wife and son.

The agents, who wore civilian clothes, also roughed up Western reporters and television crews covering the protest, which drew about 20 people at Moscow's Arbat shopping

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov later told reporters that young toughs, not security agents, were responsible for breaking up the protest.

However, it was clear at the scene that the plainclothesmen were not teen-age vigilantes. They were wellorganized and were backed by uniformed police and snowplows.

All of those detained - seven at the protest site and six on their way there - were released after a few hours. Six were fined $77 for "petty hooliganism." Police also briefly detained a Western correspondent.

The protesters, many of them Jews, had been gathering daily at the Arbat mall since Monday. They demand to be allowed to emigrate and call for the release of Begun, a Hebrew teacher who was sentenced in October 1983 to seven years in prison for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda."

Authorities did not interfere with the demonstrations on Monday and Tuesday, but on Wednesday plainclothes agents shoved the protesters off Arbat Square.

On Thursday, the demonstrators lined up along one side of the brickpaved mall which runs through one of Moscow's oldest districts. Within minutes, they were surrounded by about 50 plainclothesmen. A small snowplow began circling the demonstrators, forcing them to move back and forth across the mall. Authorities later used that snow plow and a larger one to help herd the protesters off the square. Men in plainclothes walked with them, attacking protesters who strayed and shoving them back into the group.

A few of the demonstrators held up signs that read: "Free Josef Begun' and "Let Us Go To Israel."

The security agents quickly grabbed them and turned them over o uniformed police. The agents also punched and kicked Western camera crews and reporters who tried to photograph the protest.

Uniformed police officers, normally quick to break up any street violence, did not make a move against the "civilians" who beat up the demonstrators and reporters.

Police detained Hartwig Nathe, a correspondent for the West German news agency DPA, for about 45 minutes and confiscated his film. Meanwhile, half a dozen people in civilian clothing photographed and filmed the protest without interference from police.

Begun's wife, Inna, and Tanya Edelshtein, whose husband Yuli is serving a three-year sentence on a drug possession conviction, were among those detained first.

Begun's son, Boris, raised a placard saying "Free my father, Josef Begun," and was taken away by six men who punched and slapped him as they walked.

Another group of plainclothesmen scuffled with protesters as Begun was being detained. One of the agents chanted "Jews, Jews" in German. A few passers-by shouted, "Go back to work" and "Stop dirtying our

Valentine show offers soft melodies, dining

By The Collegian Staff

"Serenade Concert IV," a K-State Choir production, is almost sold out for Saturday evening, said Rod Walker, professor of music and choir conductor.

"It's an evening of light music coupled with dinner in sort of a dinner theater atmosphere," Walker said of the St. Valentine's Day weekend production Friday and Saturday at the Holiday Inn-Holidome, 530 Richards Drive.

He said the show will offer a different setting in which people can listen to music.

"It's an informal concert setting that has been very popular. This is our fourth year," he said.

At $20 a person, the evening begins with refreshments at 6:30 p.m., buffet at 7 p.m. and entertainment following, including a Broadway medley, a collection of tunes from the Carpenters and a Gershwin medley.

The pop music and romantic atmosphere appeal to K-State students and townspeople alike,

"People come in from Clay Center and surrounding cities. A lot of the time, tables are reserved for a group," Walker said. He added he often sees people spending Valentine's Day with friends at the concert, in addition to those with their sweethearts.

A portion of the concert's profits will be used for music and expenses, and another portion will help with traveling expenses for the choir's trip to Switzerland in

The Serenade Concert is one of four annual performances by the choir. "Choral Classics," featuring masterworks and standard pieces, "A K-State Christmas" and the President's Concert in April are the other performances.

"We commission American composers each year to write pieces for the presidential concert," Walker said.

James McCray and Mark Haves are composing pieces for the upcoming April concert.

"Hayes has worked with us before. He is a professional arranger/composer with a strong background in jazz," Walker said.

Kansas task force to study AIDS issue Walker said prevention of AIDS in

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Lt. Gov. Jack Walker today announced plans for a high profile task force to study the risk of AIDS in Kansas and recommend the best way to attack the problem.

Walker told a Statehouse news conference the cases of Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome reported in Kansas are relatively low, compared to the rest of the nation. However, since the first AIDS case was reported in 1982, the number of cases reached 53 in 1986 and 31 known deaths have occurred.

"AIDS is clearly a life-threatening disease and a major public health issue." Walker said. "Its impact on our society is and will continue to be devastating.

"At the direction of Gov. Mike Hayden, I am proceeding to establish a special task force on AIDS. The problem of the task force will be to study the issue and try to come to grips with the delicate problem of educating the public in the area of prevention."

Walker said he envisions a highprofile, prestigious board of possibly 10 Kansas residents who will make recommendations about sex education in schools and how to handle the topic of AIDS on television and in the news media. The task force will report its findings and recommendations to the 1988 Legislature.

"The task force will study if and how sex education should be mandated," Walker said. "This is a serious problem and a major health problem that is potentially devastating in our world. We need to bite the bullet and address the problem candidly and out-front."

Walker is acting secretary of health and environment. His agency is responsible for tracking public health problems and fighting them.

Bob French, in charge of the agency's epidemiology wing, said Wyandotte and Johnson counties have the highest rate of reported AIDS cases with more than 10 cases each.

The agency refuses to identify counties which have fewer than 10 cases, but French said AIDS have been reported basically where there are concentrations of people, the future is one item for the task force to study, as well as finding ways to treat current victims. The cost alone must be examined, since experts estimate the price tag for treating a single AIDS victim per year runs as high as $75,000.

"We must look at education, prevention of AIDS in the future and the cost of treating and caring for the unfortunate victims," Walker said.

The federal government is providing every state with funds to study the problem and Kansas will use part of its $120,000 grant on the AIDS task force. Walker said he expects the task force to be appointed and holds its first meeting in April.

"We have to come up with a hardhitting, straight forward education program and that's going to be controversial," Walker said. "It won't be easy and we're going to need the support, prestige and backing of a lot of people in Kansas. The whole focus of the task force is to spotlight the problem and educate our citizens."

Walker took no position on a bill introduced in the House which would mandate premarital blood tests to screen for AIDS carriers when couples seek marriage licenses. He said it would cost $10 per person to test for the disease, and affect about 50,000 people who marry each year in

He did question the value of such testing because "you have to ask yourself what you've accomplished and what you can do about it once you find someone with AIDS."

NU's Invitational earns reputation as No. 1 indoors

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

Fifty-one All-American tracksters and 40 collegiate teams will join the K-State men's and women's track teams this weekend at the 'Husker Invitational Indoor Track Meet in Lincoln, Neb.

The 'Husker Invitational, an NCAA national qualifying meet, earned a great reputation of being one of the nation's top indoor meets last year with 28 national qualifiers in the two-day event

'This is probably the top collegiate invitational indoors in the country this year without a doubt," Coach John Capriotti said.

"Last year at the 'Husker meet they had 28 national qualifiers come out of that meet. If you go to a meet and you get half a dozen, it's a great meet. I imagine they'll have 20 or so this year."

Capriotti said he plans on taking a full team and most of his top athletes to Lincoln. Of those going, he has strong suspicions that distance ace Ron Stahl, triple jumper Felicia Carpenter and high jumper Brad Speer will meet national-qualifying marks in their respective events.

K-State has had three athletes qualify for nationals. Kenney Harrison qualified in the triple-jump last week at the Dallas Times-Herald Indoor with the longest jump by a collegian in the country so far this year, 54-feet-61/2 inches. Harrison will not compete at Lincoln, but will take on the world's best in the Vitalis Meet at the New Jersey Meadowlands

Kim Kilpatrick in the hurdles and Pinkie Suggs in the shot put have qualified as well. Suggs, who is undefeated in three meets this season, will face her first real competition at Nebraska from USC's Diana Clemens who was a pre-season pick to win the NCAA title and Theresa Milliford from LSU who has the longest toss in the nation so far this Clemens has a personal best toss of 55-8 nearly two feet better than Suggs.

"It's been a while (since I've had any competition)," Suggs said. "Coach told me today that there are going to be six people there who have thrown over fifty (feet). So it should be exciting."

Capriotti said the meet is non-scoring, but will be good experience for his athletes to compete in such a high-caliber event.

"I am excited about this meet because of the high level of competition," Capriotti said.

Powerlifters exhibit mental, physical strengths

By BILL LANG Collegian Reporter

The bar, straddling the shoulders of powerlifter Steve Langvardt, bends under the strain of 530 pounds of weights.

Langvardt's face and eyes are red with blood rushing to his face. He lowers himself so that his thighs are perpendicular to the floor and then he begins to rise back up.

It seems inhumanly possible, but Langvardt makes a successful lift. He places the bar on the rack and walks away with his face returning to the original hue that it was before he attempted his squat

Not only Langvardt, senior in accounting, but many others also took part in the K-State intramural powerlifting meet Thursday night at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Weight lifters had the opportunity to show their strength during the meet. Others took the night as a learning experience in order to prepare for other meets down the road.

"I got into this through my friends," said Stephen Sly, senior in math. "They were all lifting and I got into it basically to get into shape. Then I decided to give a competition a try...I liked it...I'll be competing in a few

For Sly, the part of weight lifting that fascinates him the most is the mental preperation involved.

The thing that goes through my mind before I step onto the mat is making sure I do a legal lift," Sly said. "I have to make sure it's good form and that I get the lift right to please the judges."

For other competitors, it is just a means of staying in shape while also enjoying the competition. "I just basically do it as a way to stay in shape," said Mark Sidesinger, junior in secondary education. The system used for determining the winner of each weight class was determined by the Schwartz system. The Schwartz system requires taking the weight and converting it to kilograms, then taking that number and dividing it by the amount of weight lifted by the person. Final results are the power rating of the lifter.

In the meet there were two weight classes - 130-165 and 170-230. The following are the winners with their total amount lifted and the power rating in parentheses.

130-165 weight class
1. Stephen Sly, 925, (749.34); 2. Paul Gibson, 965, (695.86); 3. Mark Sidesinger, 980, (686.49); 4. Mark Barb, (30-230 weight class 1. Steve Langvardt, 1,475, (818.63); 2. Ray Lundin, 1,425, (793.44): 3. Tyler Koch, 1,055, (682.9); 4. Jimmy Creten, 1,070, (665.97); 5. Ray Kitchen, 1,085, (595.12).

Kruger says Nebraska's 'much improved' since last meeting bounding, averaging 10.5 boards per

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

The University of Nebraska men's basketball team is hungry and will be looking to extend its winning streak to three games Saturday in action against K-State at the Bob Devany Sports Center in Lincoln.

Nebraska, 14-8 overall and 4-5 in Big Eight Conference play, has successive wins over Colorado and Iowa State. The Cornhuskers will be "fired up" for the contest, according to Coach Lon Kruger.

"They're excited and pumped up," Kruger said. "They still have thoughts of a first division finish (in the conference). We're going into a trap if we're not careful and don't play well.

The game, televised on the Raycom Sports Network, is set to start at 1:10 p.m.

K-State, 16-6 overall and second in the Big Eight at 6-3, pounded Nebraska earlier this season in Manhattan, 114-82.

"That won't happen again," Kruger said. "Nebraska's a muchimproved ball club."

The Cornhuskers are 10-2 in games played on their home court, but some critics have questioned the caliber of their opponents, which have included Detroit, Missouri-St. Louis, Brooklyn and Northwest Missouri State.

Kruger said it doesn't matter if Nebraska's schedule appears deceivingly easy.

The important thing about it is how they've done the last week or 10 days," he said. "What isn't deceiving is that they've won their last two ball said, is similar to that of K-State's. "They're not real big and they get after you defensively, although they play a lot more zone defenses than we do. They also like to push it up the court offensively after a hit or a miss," Kruger said.

Nebraska averages 73.3 points in conference games, and is led in scoring and assists by senior point guard Brian Carr. He averages 13.1 points per game, and is second on the alltime Big Eight career assists chart.

"Carr is doing an excellent job for them at the point," Kruger said. 'They've also got Bernard Day and Anthony Bailous, who are both very aggressive players."

Day, who played at Moberly Junior College with K-Staters Mitch Richmond and Charles Bledsoe, averages 11.1 points per game. Bailous, the Cornhuskers' sixth man, averages 8.8 points per game.

Other probable Nebraska starters include Bill Jackman (8.4 points per game), Keith Neubert (6.4 points per game) and Henry Buchanan (8.4 points per game.)

"It's a critical ball game for us," said Kruger, whose team has road games left against conference leaders Oklahoma and Kansas.

"If you get a road win, that's all that matters now. Of course we want to play our best against Nebraska, but if we play poorly and win by one, we're tickled to death."

NOTES...K-State leads the series with Nebraska 96-71... The 'Cats have won two of the last three games in Devaney Center ... First-year Nebraska head coach Danny Nee received a master's degree in health, physical education and recreation from K-State in 1972 when Kruger was in his sophomore year wearing a Wildcat uniform...K-State's Norris Coleman leads the Big Eight in regame, and is third in scoring, averaging 24 points per game. Tennis team building into contenders

Nothing would have made K-State women's tennis coach Steve Bietau happier than to have seen the student athletic fee pass during the student election Tuesday

Unfortunately for Bietau, it didn't meet the two-thirds majority it needed to pass. He said it would have made his job of building the team into a Big Eight Conference contender much easier in the next

"The fee is critical to us," Bietau said Wednesday night before the polls closed. "We've made a lot of progress in the last two years and learned how to do a lot with a little.

"If we get to the point where we have an even shot at those people, we're going to be up in the top three in the conference.

For this season though, Bietau said the Wildcats should finish fourth or fifth in the conference race. Quite an improvement for a team that finished last in the Big Eight last year at 4-12.

K-State, after hosting a doubles tournament last weekend at Cottonwood Racquet Club, plays Saturday against a strong Texas Tech squad in Topeka. Bietau admits that he doesn't know much about the thwest Conference school exept that they are a good, solid

In the fall season, a muchimproved squad recorded a 6-7 record. Conference rankings aren't uted in the fall.

"All and all, I think the fall went pretty well," Bietau said. "We were a little disappointed at the end. We thought we had a winning team this fall."

Bietau said part of last season's problems was weaknesses in ubles play. Improving the 'Cats in that area was one of Bietau's goals before the spring term.

It appears Bietau may have reached that goal. Last weekend, K-State sent two of its three doubles teams into the finals of the KSU/Pepsi Doubles Invitational, securing first- and second-place finishes. "I think we've done what we've needed to do so far for the spring, Bietau said. "We've got some things to work on and what we're doing right now is all gearing toward the first of April, which are the Big Eight matches.

There are no new members on the team for the spring, but Sigrid Ivarsson returns to the team after sitting out a year to work in her native Sweden. Bietau said Ivarsson will battle for one of the top three spots with Valerie Rive' and Lena Svensson.

Svensson underwent arthroscopic surgery on a knee last Friday after twisting it during workouts. No cartilage damage or tears were discovered and she is expected to return to the court within four weeks. Svensson com-piled a 9-4 record during the fall season, upset the defending Big Eight champion in the first round of the ITCA regional and is listed as the team's No. 1 singles player.

Rive' accumulated a 7-6 record last season while playing in the No. 1 through No. 3 singles positions.

No time for parties as Lady Cats have discovered in Big 8

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Staff

Anyone who has been following this season's Big Eight Conference women's basketball standings knows that no one team has consistently held the lead for a prolonged period of time.

After an overtime victory Wednesday against Colorado, K-State's women's basketball is No. 1 in the Big Eight for the second time this

The Lady Cats, 18-5 overall and 7-3 in conference play, will try to maintain their slight advantage at 3 p.m. Saturday when they are challenged by a tough Nebraska team in Lin-With Oklahoma State and Missouri knocking at the door of K-State's No. spot, a must-win situation is in order for the 'Cats to retain their conference lead. Assistant coach Eddie Vaughn said things are business as usual with the Lady Cats and they understand what they are faced with.

"The team was happy to win (Wednesday night), but I believe now they are starting to take a little bit more businesslike approach to winning," Vaughn said.

"They understand now that there is no time to celebrate...the reality is that anyone in this league can beat you and you've got to be physically and mentally prepared for the

Earlier in the season, K-State defeated the Lady Cornhuskers in Ahearn Field House, 71-65. This victory came off a "nightmare" defeat the previous season where K-State just fell apart, Vaughn said.

"Nebraska's a good team and they play hard. You've got to be fearful of teams who play hard, especially on their home court."

In order to defeat Nebraska, 13-10 and 6-4, Vaughn said the Lady Cats must continue to play tough defense and with great intensity. K-State has consistently held its opponents below their scoring average.

"When you're holding them below what they are used to (scoring), you obviously don't have to shoot as well, and what we've been doing is shooting well enough to win," Vaughn said. "When we start pushing up our percentage, we'll be near to reaching our potential.'

World's best hockey masters gather in Quebec

By The Associated Press

QUEBEC - After winning a fastpaced thriller against the Soviets' best, what can the NHL All Stars do for an encore? Play again Friday night, which they will do. "This series is not over yet," said Edmonton's Mark Messier, voted the star of the game after Wednesday night's dramatic 4-3 victory over the Soviet Union's national team in their two-game Rendez-Vous 87 series.

"Friday's game is a big test. We will have to be more prepared because the Soviets will be more prepared."

cost the Soviets the first game, according to Soviet Coach Victor Tikhonov.

'We didn't know what the NHL was going to do," he said in assessing Game One. "We couldn't put a game plan together.'

In this series involving many of the world's greatest hockey players, the NHL team beat the supposedly superior Soviets largely on emotion. This translated into a big defensive the best hockey team in the world. On Wednesday night at Le Colisee, the All Stars played a disciplined effort against what many consider

It was a lack of preparedness that defensive game, picking up men all over the ice and jamming them into the boards. That will be the best way to beat the Soviets Friday night, too, the NHL players agreed. With your face against the glass, it's hard to make a good play," said Montreal's Rick Green, who repeatedly slammed Soviet forwards to the barriers Wednesday night. Despite all that jamming, the contest night was relatively anger free. There were no fights and only five penalties were called, four against the All Stars by Soviet referee

Nikolai Morosov for hooking. The only penalty called against the Soviets was by NHL linesman Ronn Finn. Morosov had been criticized in the past for prejudicial officiating, but

NHL players did not think that was the case Wednesday night. "I thought the officiating was fair," said Philadelphia's Dave

Poulin, who scored the winning goal. The NHL not only had the edge in defense, but also in goaltending with Grant Fuhr. "I don't have to point out," said All Star Coach Jean Perron, "that you don't win against the strong teams, and particularly the Soviets, unless you get quality goaltending."

Agencies say execution costs less than opponents project

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Two state agencies are floating figures to Gov. Mike Hayden that indicate the cost of the death penalty would not be as high as opponents say, but those fighting restoration of capital punishment in Kansas contend the new numbers may be too low.

The figures, given to Hayden by the Department of Corrections and the state Board of Indigents' Defense Services, show substantial differences in cost estimations for capital improvements at state prisons to house inmates on death row, and for the state's cost ir. ensuring adequate defense for those accused of capital crimes. The Department of Corrections has estimated the cost of capital improvements at nearly $1.3 million for the next two fiscal years, said Larry Cowger, assistant to Richard Mills, secretary of corrections. Some opponents have said capital improvements would cost the department $7 million.

In addition, the state might have to pay only $1.4 million for the costs of defense in capital murder cases, said Ronald Miles, executive director of the public defender board. In a board report issued in December, the cost was estimated at $2.6 million.

However, two leading opponents of the death penalty in the Legislature were skeptical, noting the political climate surrounding the death penalty issue. And, a University of Kansas law professor who supplied the Legislature with cost estimates said both figures still might be too low.

In addition, Gary Stotts, Hayden's acting budget director, said his office has not finished preparing its final estimates on the costs associated with the death penalty.

"There's no question that a capital punishment system is inordinately more expensive than the system we have now," said David Gottlieb, the KU law professor, whose cost estimates have been quoted by opponents in the Legislature. "The only issue is how much more.

The House passed a bill which would make death by lethal injection a possible penalty for premeditated murder. Hayden campaigned last year on restoring capital punishment in Kansas.

Opponents have cited cost as a reason for not approving the death penalty in legislative debates.

Gottlieb originally estimated the death penalty would cost the state $7 million a year, plus another $7 million for construction of a new death row. An estimate supplied by the Legislative Research Department was almost $10.9 million a year for for defense costs alone.

However, Hayden has said he doesn't think those figures are accurate. He calls the cost argument a "smoke screen" being used by foes.

Coaches hopeful despite referendum defeat

By CHAD L. SANBORN Staff Writer

Kansas State University

For the head coaches of the nonrevenue teams the results of the Non-Revenue Sports Scholarship Fee referendum had a bright side. But it was overshadowed by consequences of the bill's failure.

"Roughly 60 percent of the student body (of those who voted) supported us," said Mike Clark, head baseball coach. "We're not a publicity sport, and to have that percentage of the students say they'll sacrifice two pitchers of beer a semester for you is pretty good."

The bill, which needed the approval of nearly 67 percent of the students who voted, received only 59 percent in Wednesday's elections. Student Senate still has the option of passing the bill.

John Capriotti, men's and women's track and cross country coach, said he felt a little cheated because the bill went down even though it received a clear majority. "That is like winning a race by two seconds and having someone tell you that you lost because you needed to win by four seconds," he said.

If it had passed, activity fees would have increased $6.50 a semester for full-time students and $3 for parttime students. This would have generated an estimated $193,000 to fund 40 percent of scholarships for non-revenue sports.

Capriotti said it isn't just the nonrevenue sports programs that would have benefited from the fee.

"The whole University needs it. Sports are a great way to promote the school," Capriotti said. "They are not the only way, but they are a good one. I'm not making a judgment as to whether that is right or wrong; I'm saying that is reality.

Clark agreed with Capriotti. "We are going to be in the sports pages 60 times this semester because we are going to play 60 times," he said. "But it won't say how many scholarships we have or how much money we get. All it will say is 'K-State' and whether we won or

Clark said he hoped the bill would pass because it would allow his program to bring the number of scholarships in line with other Big Eight programs, as well as those at such NAIA schools as Emporia State University and Fort Hays State University.

Steve Bietau, head women's tennis coach, said it is next to impossible to compete with schools that offer more scholarships.

"It is tough to compete when you have less than four scholarships and all the other schools have eight," he said. "We are here to win. If we are going to compete, we have to do it

Because of this, the baseball team has to go out of state to get many players, but then travel expenses cut into scholarship funds.

Seib discusses days as Iranian hostage

By SARAH KESSINGER Arts & Entertainment Editor

An air of emotion drifted through Thomas More Prep auditorium in Hays Friday morning and most of it came from the front row. Seated there was the family of Gerald F. Seib, the Wall Street Journal correspondent recently released from five days of captivity in Tehran, Seib, a 1974 graduate of TMP, sat on stage among school faculty and smiled down to his wife, Barbara, and family, some with a glistening of tears in their eyes. A "Welcome Home" banner stretched across the

When he stood up to speak, the student body responded with a standing ovation. Rapt attention prevailed as he told of his experience and the relief of coming home.

"If I'd known I'd get this kind of welcome home for getting thrown in jail, I would have tried it a long time ago," Seib joked with the crowd of nearly 300. "This is a special place for me, and that's why I wanted to come back. "I was awfully afraid of what this might do to my family," Seib said of his unexplained detainment Jan. 31. "At least I knew what was happening to me through this whole thing. They could only guess, and that's the worse situation.

"And then I found out how much support they had, especially support from TMP, and it was the biggest feeling of relief. Because at a time like that I don't think you can have enough help, and you can't have enough friends, and they found out how many friends they had here in Hays," he said.

Seib went on to explain his im-prisonment, saying it "became a better-known story than I would have ever realized while I was sitting in Tehran."

"I was invited to Iran to cover the war. I did that. I was thrown in jail as I was trying to leave the country. I'm not sure why," he said.

"I was questioned at length, I was accused of being a spy, and in the end, I think the Iranians admitted it was all a big mistake, and they let me go. It was a very traumatic experience."

There were some "thinly veiled threats" during the interrogation period, Seib said, although he never feared being killed. The worst experience during questioning was being blindfolded, he said.

"It's amazing what happens in your head when you can't see anything outside. That was probably the biggest mind game of all. All you had to do was guess about who your interrogators were and what they

TEL AVIV, Israel - Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said just before leaving for a 10-day U.S. visit Sunday that Israel has nothing to hide in the Iran arms scandal.

In a radio interview earlier Sunday, he also said the Reagan administration has elevated Israel to the status of official ally. Israeli officials said this could mean expanded military cooperation between the two countries.

Shamir, speaking to reporters at Ben Gurion Airport, said his trip would not be clouded by a report that Jonathan Pollard, a former U.S. Navy civilian intelligence analyst who has pleaded guilty to spying for Israel, had provided top-grade intelligence.

"It (Pollard's actions) was done against the will and against the policy of the Israeli government and we have cooperated with the United States government in putting an end to this," Shamir said.

Asked about Israel's role in the sale of U.S. arms to Iran, Shamir said, "We have nothing to hide and I think we acted in accordance with our relations with the United States and in accordance with our conscience.' Recent U.S. Senate findings indicated Israel played a part in managing the arms sales and did not only acceed to U.S. requests to transfer weapons to Iran as Israel

He also denied Israel supplied arms to rebels fighting Nicaragua's leftist government. "It's never happened and we've never given arms to the Contras," he said.

Speaking on Israel Radio earlier Sunday, Shamir said: "Israel is considered for the first time, officially, an ally. There is much significance to this declaration, above all political significance."

He said the new relationship would put Israel on a par with non-NATO allies like Japan, Australia, South Korea and Egypt.

Shamir said specifics of what he termed "certain advantages" from the status change would be worked out during his visit.

A Shamir spokesman, Yossi Ahimeir, told The Associated Press a 1983 bilateral strategic cooperation agreement could be expanded under the new formal relationship. "I don't know the details. But it is understood that the cooperation, the level of military cooperation, will now be higher, for sure," said

Concentrations of harmful gas topic of survey

By LORI LINDSTROM

Collegian Reporter

In an effort to detect possible health risks caused by radon - a colorless, odorless gas produced by the radioactive decay of uranium - the Kansas Department of Health and Environment is conducting a survey to determine the concentrations of the gas trapped in Kansas homes.

Radon gets into basements of houses, causing problems in "superinsulated houses," houses so tightly insulated that the radon cannot escape out into the atmosphere, said George Clark II, professor of

A House subcommittee endorsed a resolution asking the Department of Health and Environment to create an advisory committee to study the potential of radon gas in Kansas and its threat to Kansas residents. Randomly selected households will receive a radon detector in the mail. The detector, which contains activated charcoal to absorb radon, should be placed in the home and exposed for two days. The detector will be sent back to the Environmental Protection Agency for analysis.

The detector method will serve only as an indicator of potential radon risks since the annual radon level varies from room to room as well as season to season. Radon is found in all rocks, filtering up through cracks and spaces, invading basements and homes. Houses above nuclear waste sites or uranium deposits seem to have the most problems, said Cliff Meloan, professor of chemistry. The southern part of Kansas would have more problems with radon

The ECO Data advertisement claims houses need to have a screening test to determine if hazardous radon levels exist. The ECO Data ad said hazardous exposure levels may cause health problems of the house residents since it has been discovered that uranium miners have developed higher incidences of lung cancer. The EPA has known about the uranium miners exposure to radon for years, Armstrong said. But they learned about radon collecting inside of houses only two years ago.

The EPA then realized radon could

Rebel says 200 suicides 'honorable'

JAFFNA, Sri Lanka - A Tamil rebel officer said more than 200 of his guerrillas have committed suicide by swallowing the ampule of potassium cyanide each wears around his neck in case of capture.

In the Sri Lankan capital of Colombo, the government confirmed that some rebel prisoners have killed themselves with cyanide, but said the figure was less than a dozen.

The guerrillas' capsule of white power, when bitten, brings death in

"It is better to take cyanide and take your own life than to be subjected to inhuman torture," said Subramanium Kanagaratnan, a lieutenant of the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, the most powerful rebel group fighting for an independent Tamil nation against the majority Sinhalese.

Kanagaratnan's war name is Raheem. The name, in silver script, dangles from a chain around his neck next to his cyanide capsule.

"No one can withstand torture. We would reveal secrets, and so we choose an honorable death rather than betray our liberation struggle," he told The Associated Press in a recent interview.

Outside interests seek waste site

LINCOLN, Neb. - While lawmakers in Nebraska, Kansas and Arkansas consider legislation that would allow their states to withdraw from a compact seeking a disposal site for low-level radioactive wastes, the District of Columbia wants information on how to join.

The district's interest is the latest development in the low-level radioactive waste issue as the Central Interstate Compact approaches the deadline for developing a site in one of its five member states.

The District of Columbia is interested because it does not want to develop its own disposal facility and must find a place to dispose of the 1,500 to 2,000 cubic feet of contaminated waste it generates annually, said Frances Bowie, administrator in the district's Department of Consumer and Regulatory Affairs.

The district has applied for membership in the Northeast Compact and made inquiries about the Southeast Compact, Bowie said. "We're looking at all possible options at this point," Bowie said.

Lake Wobegon's Keillor to retire

ST. PAUL, Minn. - The leading citizen of Lake Wobegon will long be remembered, fans of "A Prairie Home Companion" said Sunday after learning that host Garrison Keillor will end the nationally broadcast radio show to "resume the life of a shy person."

"A friend will be leaving," said Greg Waples, a New York City attorney who joined hundreds of others calling to seek tickets to the show before it winds up its 13-year run June 13. "For someone living in New York, it was an oasis of calm."

The 44-year-old Keillor, whose 1985 book "Lake Wobegon Days" became a best-seller, began his Saturday night radio monologue by saying his show "will be closing up shop at the end of this season.

'It's a very simple and painful decision that we learn to make cheerfully," Keillor told his audience. "I want to resume the life of a shy person. I want to be a writer again. I'm tired, and it is time to

The Anoka, Minn., native said he wants to spend more time with his family and live awhile in his wife's native country of Denmark.

Priests accused of sodomizing boys

LAFAYETTE, La. - Four years afterward, Faye Gastal's 12-yearold son still stared from the window of his darkened home, watching for the black Camaro that used to come for him.

He was afraid the man would come back, the man who did those strange things to him. The man with the black car and the black gun. The black suit. And the white collar.

It has been more than a year since the Rev. Gilbert Gauthe pleaded guilty to charges of sexually abusing Gastal's son and 10 other altar boys at his rural parish church. The case shocked the area's devout Cajuns and rattled the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Gauthe is serving a 20-year prison sentence, but the scandal hasn't ended with him. A second priest from the Diocese of Lafayette has been sentenced on sex charges and suits are pending against a third; one church official says about 20 have been accused of or counseled for sexual

Birth defects likely near Chernobyl

CHICAGO - Women who were pregnant and lived near the Chernobyl nuclear power plant when it exploded and burned last year are 50 percent more likely than others to give birth to a mentally retarded child, a researcher said Sunday.

Dr. Robert Gale of the University of California in Los Angeles, who has treated victims of the Chernobyl disaster, said 300 babies have now been born to mothers who were exposed at short range to Chernobyl's radiation during their pregnancy.

Studies by Gale, Soviet doctors and the U.S. Department of Energy estimate that 39 of the 300 infants will suffer from some form of mental retardation, Gale said.

That is 50 percent higher than the 26 cases that would be expected in a population of 300 infants not exposed to radiation during fetal development, Gale said.

TV violence blurs reality, psychologist says

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY Collegian Reporter

Violent television programs can alter a child's perception by inferring that the world is a mean and dangerous place, and according to one psychologist, the child will have trouble distinguishing between the two unless parents explain to their children what is reality and fiction.

John Murray, psychologist and head of the Department of Human Development and Family Studies, said a lack of parental feedback could have serious consequences for children who watch violent programs.

Researchers have been questioning the impact of televised violence on children since the 1950s, Murray said. Citing studies by himself and others, he said most psychologists who have researched the topic are "convinced by the accumulated evidence from the hundreds of research projects which indicate a relationship between watching TV violence and children's aggressive behavior.

Pre-schoolers and children, on the average, spend more than four hours a day watching television, Murray said.

1985, the American In Psychological Association informed broadcasters and the public of the potential dangers that viewing violence on television may pose for

"Psychological research has shown three effects of viewing television violence: children may become less sensitive to pain and suffering of others; they may become more fearful of the world around them; and they are more likely to behave in ag-gressive or harmful ways to others," he said.

In one study, said Murray, children who watched "Batman" and "Superman" cartoons got into more fights, didn't play as well with friends and had fewer friends than children who watched specialized

Heavy viewing of Saturday morning cartoons - which may contain 20-25 violent acts an hour - could have serious effects on children, causing them to be less sensitive and less reactive to violence, he said.

In addition to violence, television brings topics such as sex, drug abuse and alcoholism to the attention of children sooner than some parents would like.

"The more the parent is involved in selecting programs and shaping the child's tastes, the less risk of the child watching these types of programs," Murray said. "The earlier they do this, the greater their influence will be."

Another way parents can influence their children to watch less violent programs is to incorporate a time-According to Murpoint system. ray, the parents could allocate a certain number of "TV points" to the child each week. Violent programs would be given a higher point value than non-violent and learningoriented programs. When the points are used up, the child would not be allowed to watch more television.

Murray suggested that parents watch at least one episode of the programs their children view so they have firsthand knowledge of violence content. When violence does appear, parents can discuss with the children why these acts occur and what motivated the character to commit the violent acts.

Explaining to children how the character should have behaved, what the consequences of violence are and that violence on entertainment programs is "not real" is important, he said.

Banning violent or offensive programs is another option, but parents should explain to children why they object to them. Parents should also encourage their children to watch programs that demonstrate helping, caring and cooperation.

Murray also said there is not enough specialized programming targeted especially for children.

Commercial television is based on audience size for producing revenue. Networks are unwilling to commit the money and the time for specialized programming because the programs would be targeted toward too small a group, Murray said. Specialized programming can only be seen on public television.

The only thing that is "specialized" about programming for children on commercial networks now is toy-selling strategies.

Programs are becoming hour-long commercials, Murray said. Toys are developed first, such as "He-Man," "Transformers" and "Masters of the Universe," then violent cartoons are made for the purpose of selling the

"It's hard to differentiate what is selling the product and what is selling the concept," Murray said.

And the problems appear to be getting worse.

The Federal Communications Commission has allowed several toy manufacturers to develop cartoon programming that will actually "command" their toys. The child's toy will charge around the living room floor firing laser lights, responding to inaudible signals beamed through the cartoon's soundtrack.

"Part of the reason for buying these toys is to engage in and be a part of the action," Murray said. Although there is some opposition to bringing this type of hard-sell into the living room, it appears it will con-

"It seems that no one with the power and authority to change programming for children cares," said

Those that make and sponsor the programs are concerned with selling the toys and generating the largest possible audience.

The solution is not to throw our televisions away, but instead parents should focus on what is right about television and highlight those effects, Murray said.

The immediate options for parents dealing with their children are clear, Parents should be concerned about what their children see on television and take an interest in their children's program choices. Violence on television does lead to aggressive behavior by children and teenagers who watch the pragrams, he said.

"Not all children become aggressive, of course, but there are positive correlations between TV violence and aggression," Murray

Children learn by viewing TV, professors say

By JODI SWENGEL Collegian Reporter

While many people may think children only vegetate in front of the television, they really are learn-ing and understanding what TV programs portray, said two University of Kansas professors.

"Kids are not vacant zombies watching TV. They are active in learning and understanding what they see," said John Wright, professor in human development and professor in human development and family life, co-lectured "Television and Children: A Critical View," focusing on the impact that television has on children. About 50 people attended the lec-ture Friday in Justin Hall sponsored by the Department of Human Development and Family Studies.

Wright and Huston are co-directors at the Center for Research on the Influence of Television on Children, which has been operating for 10 years.

Viewing TV programs at an early age has an enormous effect on children, Wright said. The most critical developmental stage is bet-ween the ages of three to seven. He said while TV is dynamic — always changing — the research that is conducted also is changing.

Children's shows are mainly broken down into two groups - informative programs such as Sesame Street and animated shows such as cartoons. Informative shows have a positive impact on children, and they should be ened to watch these shows ially in the early learning

The parent plays an enormous part in developing the child's TV habits. What the parent watches not just what the parent tells the child to watch - is what the child will view, Huston said.

Gender, parental attitudes and der siblings make a difference for the viewing patterns of the younger child. Older siblings usually don't watch informative shows aimed at younger children, so the child watching TV with an older sibling is exposed to shows aimed at an older audience, Huston said.

Covert NSC operation initiated by Reagan, paper reports

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - A covert National Security Council operation linked to the Iran-Contra affair had its roots in a broad policy initiative launched by President Reagan in 1982 to foster world democracy, a published report said Sunday.

The policy initative eventually spawned a public, congressionallyfunded program called the National Endowment for Democracy as well as the covert operation, which came to be directed by White House aide Lt. Col. Oliver L. North, The New York Times reported. But both the White House and the president of the endowment said Sunday that the endowment is not related to any covert operation. U.S. government officials familiar with North's activities told The Associated Press in November that North used the phrase "Project Democracy" to refer to covert operations in Europe, particularly to the financial mechanisms for handling the operations.

The officials, who provided information on condition of anonymity, spoke before the Reagan administration fired North and revealed that proceeds from arms sales to Iran had been diverted to Nicaraguan Contra rebels

Since then, the officials said, NSC documents with references to Project Democracy have been delivered to the FBI, congressional investigators and the presidentially appointed Tower Commission, which is examining the NSC.

Meanwhile, Newsweek magazine reported that evidence gathered from the NSC computers shows White House chief of staff Donald Regan, outgoing CIA director William Casey and former national security adviser John Poindexter were more deeply involved in the covert dealings than previously established.

Newsweek, in its Feb. 23 issue. quoted sources as saying the electronic evidence shows that North kept his superiors informed of his activities.

One source told the magazine Poindexter knew about the exchange of arms for hostages and North's private funding for the Contras. Sources also told Newsweek that references to Regan found in the NSC computer system suggest he knew of the private funding.

Another source told the magazine Casey knew of the arms-for-hostages deal and about North's private fund raising and the diversion of arms money to the rebels.

The covert Project Democracy run by North out of the NSC grew to include its own communications systems, secret envoys, leased ships and airplanes, offshore bank accounts and corporations and culminated in the Iran-Contra revelations, the Times said.

One aspect of the covert operation was private fund-raising, according to the newspaper, which said donors included wealthy individuals and foreign governments.

Rep. Dante Fascell, D-Fla, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and a member of the board of the endowment for democracy, told reporters Sunday he had no knowledge of the NSC covert operation.

'The privatization of foreign policy implementation is a serious matter...I don't know what this project is you're talking about or the extent of it, but it sounds like it has the elements in it of all the kind of things we're concerned about," he said. Project Democracy, according to the Times, was also the name given the public initiative that resulted in the establishment in November 1983 of the endowment, a private, nonprofit organization that awards grants with a goal of strengthening democratic institutions around the world.

"If it (the reported NSC covert operation) is true, we have absolutely no association with it," said Carl Gershman, president of the endowment. "The endowment is an entity in and of itself run by an independent and distinguished board."

White House spokesman Ben Jarrett did not comment on any link in the origin of the covert and public programs.

Traeger's statements devoid of justification

In what was termed an "unfor- premise, but few will buy it. tunate accident" by Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, the furor resulting over her comments in Thursday's Collegian regarding the failed sports scholarship fee referendum was appropriately quelled at Thursday night's Senate meeting.

In the article, Traeger was soon," she said. quoted as saying Senate "would bring it (the fee) up" and that something "definitely needs to be done" regarding referendum's failure.

She also implied that graduate students and students in the College of Veterinary Medicine were responsible for the fee's failure since those two groups were so adamantly opposed to it.

What's interesting is that in only one college - the College of Business Administration - did the referendum receive the necessary two-thirds vote for passage. As a result of her statements, Traeger said she was inundated Thursday with angry calls from students. Those calls were justified.

Although Traeger never said at least publicly - she was misquoted, she did everything but. At Thursday's meeting, she told Senators she was "unaware I was being interviewed."

This is ludicrous. She was talking to the Collegian reporter and she didn't know she was being interviewed? An interesting sure the best solution.

Logically it was the only thing she could say to cover her comments and protect herself from the wrath of Senate. In fact, she apologized to Senate a number of times. "I'm very sorry it (the story) came out to imply there would be action taken very Unfortunately, that was the implication and there is only one person who could have given it: Traeger. If in fact she was just 'shooting out ideas (Wednesday) night," as she said, then she should have made it clear at that time that Senate would examine all avenues, instead of coming before Senate and pouting that she didn't know she was being interviewed.

Denying responsibility is not very becoming to any public official.

However, despite her lapse in judgment Wednesday night, Traeger was wise to tell senators that nothing would be "ramrailed" through regarding the athletic fee. Whether she would have made the same statement had she not been inundated with angry calls is not certain.

This issue obviously is not dead, if Senate has anything to do with it.

other states in something. We, states? the few, the proud, those who live in the "land of ahs" have the honor of having 18 counties that are geologically suitable to house low-level radioactive waste.

This is opposed to the 10 counties in Nebraska, two in Arkansas, one in Louisiana and none in Oklahoma. This number does not guarantee that Kansas will be chosen to host the waste site, but it is a front-runner in the contest.

In 1982, Kansas made the decision to join in the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact. The five states joined in the pact with the mission of finding a central dump site for all the states involved.

The volume of waste is not being considered in the decision of finding a host state for the site. Louisiana, Nebraska and Arkansas produce double and triple the amount of waste that Kansas does. Why would Kansas want to on any other state.

Each state should take care of the storage of its own radioactive waste and not risk the lives of the residents of another state. One state will receive all the benefits but none of the drawbacks of using nuclear energy. The winning state of this game has the honor of taking all the risk.

Transporting the waste material and any accidents that may accompany this process would endanger the residents. Any accidents that may happen in the plant once it is built would also cause long-term harm to the environment. The chances of this happening may be slim but there is always that chance.

Kansas is an agricultural state, and maintaining the balance of the environment is extremely important for its survival.

Discussion of Vietnam is vital

"Each one, iron helmeted, protects his

His mind's beyond protection. What's

One mistake and you're gone from hell. You're dead.

The living stare at nothing with the slain." This verse was taken from a poem I read last week. It wasn't the originality of the subject nor the style that attracted my attention.

It was the author. My brother Chris is 16 years old. He has tried very hard to perpetuate the stereotype of the average American teenager. He plays basketball, cruises mall parking lots for a living and listens to Van Halen. His only divergence so far has been his dream to enter the Air Force Academy.

And yet when asked to write a poem this semester in an English class, he chose the topic of war. I was immediately intrigued at why Chris would interrupt his Johnson County existence to think about war. He told me later that he had recently seen such movies as "Platoon" and "The Killing Fields" and that these movies were on his mind during this class assignment.

Now, I was beginning to get that "Twilight Zone" feeling, for I too had recently seen "Platoon" and couldn't stop thinking about it. But when I realized that this film and others could make a Van Halen fan express such thoughts as in this poem, it became difficult to fathom.

You see, Chris and his friends felt cheated when Sylvester Stallone didn't receive an Oscar nomination for "Rambo." That's a slight exaggeration, but they did see it several times and completely enjoyed it. I, on the other hand, after seeing a "Rambo" clip with the quote, "Do we get to win this time?," felt that I could do without losing any more brain cells. But if my disbelief was momentary in that such nonsense could be funded, such disbelief continues now that "Rambo" has been so successful.

I, in my own way, feared "Rambo" and its success. I have always believed that Hollywood is fully aware of its potential and utilizes its resources to have a fundamental effect on its audience around the world. For instance, Hollywood has made many war films to instill pride and justify other war ef-

But the Vietnam War and its bitter conflict was not pacified by the movie screen. A classic example was John Wayne's attempt in "The Green Berets." Wayne attempted to incorporate his myth in the realism of Vietnam to justify the war and was very unsuc-

But Hollywood would not give up. In the last few years we have been witness to what Oliver Stone, the director of "Platoon," has characterized as "we-won-the-war revisionism." This was attempted through such films as "Rambo," "Missing in Action" starring Chuck Norris and "Uncommon Valor" with Gene Hackman.

It seems that with "Platoon," Hollywood has finally realized what we are willing to discover: the realistic truth. "Platoon" is not a token effort by any means. During 1987, three other films of this nature are to be released, including Stanley Kubrick's "Full Metal Jacket" and Francis Ford Coppola's "Gardens of Stone." The success of "Platoon" is personally very reassuring because it signals that a realistic perspective of Vietnam is finally developing. This is very apparent when such a film is economically feasible even in the profit-motivated bastion

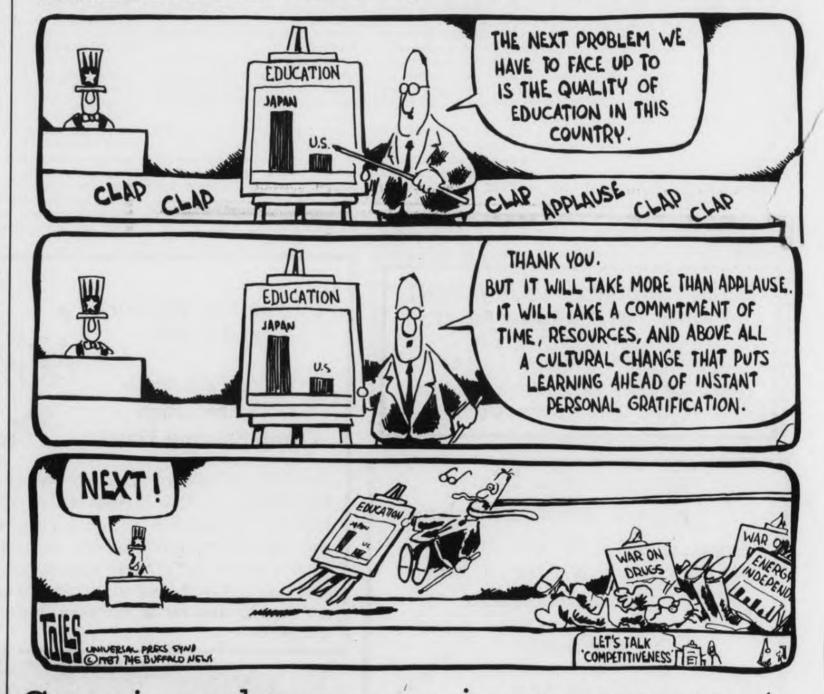

As I write this column, this realistic perspective is slowly developing for myself. I find it hard to encompass all the things that we could or should learn from Vietnam. And yet I am not at all embarrassed at my ignorance because I feel that Vietnam has been hidden from my generation. The only real attention to the subject that I have personally experienced seems to be attempts by those involved to come to grips with and/or justify the experience.

Those of us who were too young to experience Vietnam need to become aware of the situation and atmosphere that created the need to go to war. Obviously our parents and friends who experienced it would rather forget the the difficult era. But this is the worst scenario because we must learn from history, not block it out.

Many political observers like to parallel U.S foreign policy to the Vietnam experience when it suits their cause. This is often an attempt to scare us into ignorance. But this is exactly where we are positioned when we are not aware of all the ramifications of the Viet-

We need to seek out all we can about what happened, and I'm talking about doing more than buying a set of Time-Life books. We have to appreciate and begin to understand films such as "Platoon." We need to talk to our parents and formulate our own ideas. Let Stallone be the master of over-indulgence and arm wrestling, but not political philosophy. It is simply too important.

And so one of the most promising signs of the year must be my brother's poem. He is included in that generation whose knowledge of Vietnam has been frustrated by "Rambo." But he is questioning it and it is having an affect on his life. At the end of "Platoon," the legacy of the Vietnam veteran is alluded to as to communicate their experiences so that we may learn from Vietnam and not just forget it. As a veteran, Oliver Stone is setting a solid example.

Service deserves improvement

I would like to bring to the attention of the community of Manhattan and Riley County the public meeting the county commissioners will be holding at 10:30 a.m. Feb. 19 in the commission chambers at the courthouse annex. The purpose of this meeting is to decide if the people of the county would support the upgrading of the county ambulance service to advanced life-support emergency care - paramedic level - or maintain the basic life-support emergency care that is now supplied by the county am-bulance service, Riley County Emergency Medical Service.

Being an emergency medical technician who works for Riley County EMS, I think there should be no doubt that the county should have advanced life-support emergency care to be given at the scene of a heart attack of major trauma accident. We must have this level of care in order to serve the county to the fullest extent.

When I respond to a heart attack or major trauma accident, I am frustrated. This is because every second is vital to the injured. and a delay in administering the medications is senseless and also damaging to victim. This delay in administering medications causes the heart attack victim to suffer a longer attack that may cause irreversible brain and heart damage.

The drug overdose victim goes deeper into a coma and the ingested drugs are allowed to damage the nervous system for a longer period of time. The car accident victim who has lost a substantial amount of blood volume goes deeper into shock, waiting for that volume to be replaced by an intravenous solution.

The basic life support now supplied is adequate to some extent in stabilizing the injured persons described in the scenarios above. As a matter of fact, the Riley County EMS system is excellent regarding the current level of care that is supplied. Having worked for other services and observing others in other states, I feel this is one of the top services in the country. The equipment is the latest in technology. We are constantly training and learning to give the best patient care possible.

The director of Riley County EMS, Dan Morabito, is constantly testing our abilities in giving the best patient care and seeing that we are kept updated on the latest advances in the EMS field. Morabito is a wellknown paramedic in this state and others. The EMTs on staff are highly dedicated and caring, and give the utmost care to the best of their ability. This hard work and care for the patient is not always enough when those injured could receive more advanced emergency care that could decrease the support emergency care, but this level of care is limited by the fact that there are two experienced paramedics on staff, but only one is authorized to give that level of care, while the other must be denied the use of his paramedic skills and act only at the EMT level until further notified. The paramedic who can give advanced life-support care is the director of the Riley County EMS, and because of his administrative duties and the time spent attending EMS meetings in order to stay updated and trained, he cannot always respond to situations that require his skills as a paramedic.

If you feel, as I do, that this community deserves and needs the upgrading of our EMS system, I encourage you to attend this vital meeting. If you cannot attend the meeting, write the county commissioners at 110 Courthouse Plaza, Manhattan, 66502, or call them at 537-0700. Let them know your views on this vital decision they are about to make for you.

Sanctuary rationale

Veronica Wilson's letter in Wednesday's Collegian regarding the Sanctuary Movement and the Concordia sanctuary provided for refugees from Guatemala seems wellintended. Her letter provides a clear example that opponents of the Sanctuary Movement are not all bigots. It appears, however, that Wilson fails to appreciate the rationale behind Sanctuary.

The Sanctuary Movement is intended not only to aid those given sanctuary. It is designed to also arouse public opinion regarding this country's immigration policy and to change the administration's way of treating refugees from Central America and laws affecting refugees.

The Sisters in Concordia and many others including the present writer consider the administration's policy toward refugees inhumane and injust. Those active in the Sanctuary Movement are using the methods which Gandhi used so effectively to obtain independence for India, and Martin Luther King Jr. used so effectively in the struggle for civil rights. Civil disobedience has also been used effectively by civilians in the Philippines in the struggle there to over-

It seems to me that openly disobeying unjust laws or unjust interpretations of laws often is the most effective way to improve an imperfect government. Those who do not believe such methods justified should at least recognize that others do believe in them and that they sometimes will make personal sacrifices in using these methods in an attempt to help others.

Charles C. Perkins professor emeritus of psychology

Inhuman policy

In response to the Feb. 11 letter to the editor by Veronica Wilson concerning refugees, I am not as much concerned about bigots as I am about lack of understanding of what the Sanctuary Movement is all about among the general public, for it is lack of understanding that begets bigotry. To many, it seems that it is an outright disregard of the law, holding the law in contempt or, as Veronica says, "more interested in openly defying the law and gaining public attention."

It does seem more logical, on the surface at least, to "conduct the whole movement secretly and quietly to prevent provoking our government as much as possible, to ensure more safety for the refugees." As a matter of fact, the very act of sanctuary is a public act.

In Aggleville

Now Serving Coca Cola Products

It says to the public (and that includes the government) that we believe that the Immigration and Nationalization Services is not in compliance with the Refugee Act of 1980, passed by Congress, which adopted the standards of the United Nations Convention and Protocol on Refugees.

This law provides that refugees be given asylum if they cannot return to their country without persecution or fear of persecution because of their political opinion, race, religion or nationality. An estimated 1,000 Salvadorans and Guatemalans are deported every month by the INS, many of them to be persecuted and killed by the governments they are fleeing. And these people are not in sanctuary. Sanctuary offers a concrete and direct way to challenge the inhuman policy of the U.S. Government in Central America and of the INS, as well as providing a direct service to the refugees created as a result of these policies.

I would encourage you, Veronica, and many others like you who cannot understand why Manna House or any House of Sanctuary in the United States would make a spectacle of what they are doing, to become informed about the Sanctuary Movement. Read carefully the leaflets distributed by these things we now take for granted. Fifty years ago in Germany - the home of Mozart and Mercedes-Benz — Jews and Gypsies were viewed as crabgrass on the Nazi estate. Germany's best and brightest devised a plan to destroy these "enemies of the state" while the victims, exercising prudence, believed they need only remain quiet and guard their innocence until public opinion rescued them.

We here at K-State will have a perfect opportunity to learn more about the Sanctuary Movement at 7:30 p.m. on April 21 in Forum Hall when the Lou Douglas Lecture Series will bring to us Renny Golden of the Chicago Religious Task Force on Central America. Golden will speak on "Refugees: Lynchpin in Low Intensity Conflict." Becoming educated on a controversial issue brings understanding and reestablishes right relationships bringing an end to bigotry.

That never happened until World War II ended and the news of Nazi death camps news that few theretofore wanted to hear was trumpeted around the world. The price of that ignorance was 6 million Jews and Gypsies rounded up, gassed and cremated in a state experiment that proved unexpectedly successful. One legacy of the Holocaust is the realization that just being innocent isn't good enough anymore.

Since then, the modern industrial state has refined a concept called "low-intensity warfare." One of its byproducts is the steady stream of farmers who are fleeing in fear for their lives from Guatemala and El Salvador in Central America. A few of these seek sanctuary in this farm state with the Sisters of St. Joseph until it is safe for them to return to their homes.

The solution to this grave problem is to call off the dogs of war and to end political and economic oppression in Central America. Congress has the power to stop these deeds if we, the people, know the truth and say "no more." That is why the Sisters and others who have firsthand information must tell their stories. To censor ourselves is to harm not only these refugees, but ourselves.

Brewing storm

The student body has spoken! Through the only truly representative instrument available at K-State - the student referendum - the non-revenue sports scholarship went down to defeat. But hark - there is a storm brewing. Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger and Athletic Director Larry Travis have decided the student body did not speak loudly enough. Traeger is now determined to override the wishes of the student body by passing this fee through Student Senate.

What exactly are the merits of the proposed fee? It would raise $190,000 for approximately 35 out-of-state athletes. How can so many of us pay so much for so few? One can easily see Larry Travis' side. He would have nearly $200,000 a year to play with without even having to attend one alumni barbeque. Don't get me wrong. I think non-revenue sports do play a part in the University experience, but let's face it, we could all think ot worthy programs that could merit fee increases, such as a fee increase to upgrade our library, which is the smallest and most underfunded of all the Big Eight schools.

Also, it should be noted that we are already heading toward a substantial tuition increase next year. Perhaps the athletic department can be excused for having tunnel vision on this issue, but those students like Traeger who supported this fee increase should reexamine their priorities.

Lack of class

Re: "Athletic fee referendum fails; Senate may pursue proposal," in Thursday's Col-

The remarks that Larry Travis, K-State athletic director, made in the Collegian about the referendum fill me with disgust. His remark in singling out the graduate students and the veterinary medicine students for the failure of the athletic fee proposal is very unfair to these two groups. Castigating them for the way that most of them actually felt is a sign of a definite lack of class as far as I am concerned.

Likewise, Travis' remark concerning the supposed "mandate" given to the athletic fee is also out of line. His comment seems to indicate that he simply wants a rubber stamp for his proposals, right or wrong, and that student feelings and opinions matter only if they agree with him. Travis should accept the results of the referendum and quit complaining about them.

Search for cowboys

Some people say it's the boring life in Herington, Kan., that's the basis of unexpected levels of teen sex activity. Actually, it all results from the disappearance of cowboys. In the 1960s and 70s, when there were still cowboys, nobody was bored and everybody went somewhere else on Friday or Saturday nights to look for cowboys. To get a glimpse of real cowboys, to hear even if only from a distance real country music, was a source of anticipation for teens.

The rest of the week, young people looked forward to going out of town to search for cowboys. Since cowboy life wasn't being studied in the schools, cowboy exploring was the extracurricular activity in those days. The fascination of teens with cowboys resulted from the belief that when you graduated and became an adult, you got to dress western. Everybody who's a professional in towns like Herington dresses western. Teenage girls always looked, with great romantic anticipation, to the older rodeo cowboys, the best bull rider in town. Boys followed older girl rodeo queens with puppy devotion. Some thought that Herington was the Real West.

Emergency support

A very important opportunity exists in Riley County to update its ambulance service to the level of other services in towns our size. We are currently served by a basic lifesupport service, and staffed by an excellent group of emergency medical technicians who, though they are very caring and dedicated, are limited by law and by training in regard to what they can do for a victim of an accident or serious illness.

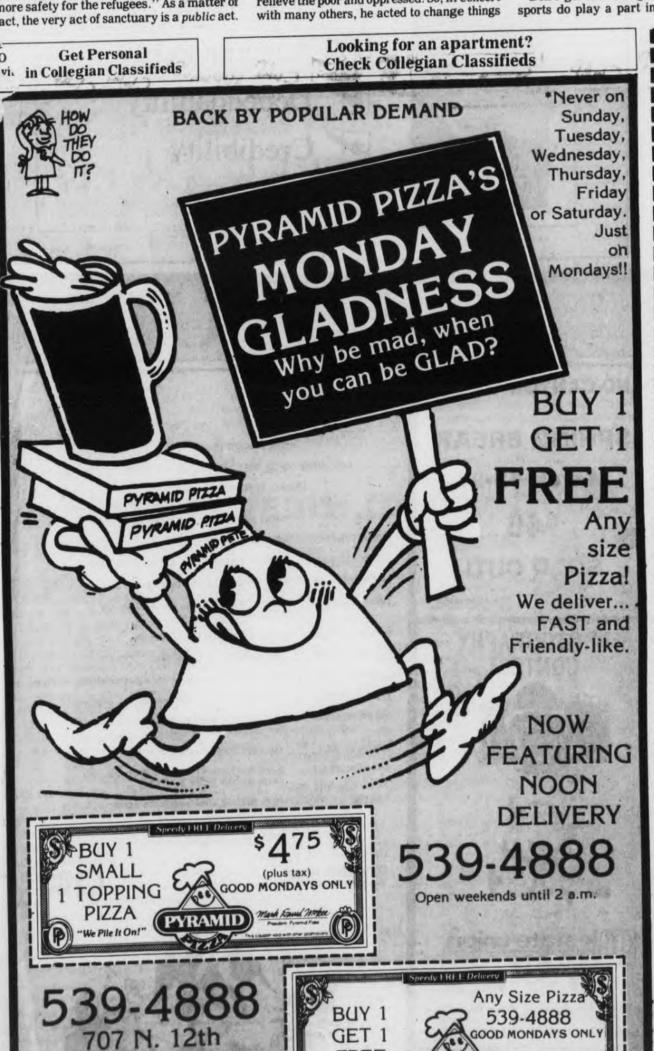

For someone experiencing a heart attack or serious injury, the availability of paramedic-level advanced life-support in the first few minutes can literally mean the difference between life and death. Such a victim does not have time to wait until they can be delivered to a hospital. They must receive advanced, lifesaving care right where they were stricken. Currently, such care is available only to a very limited extent in our county. The Emergency Medical Services director is the only paramedic allowed or equipped to function at a paramedic level. He has given a tremendous amount of his own time responding on calls at all hours seven days a week. However, if he is already on a call, out of town or unavailable, the next person to need advanced life-support cannot receive the same quality of care. The director and others desire to be able to offer the same high-quality care at all times, for all people covered by the service, including all of Riley County and parts of western Pottawatomie County. The cost would be minimal and could be offset by user fees without increasing anybody's tax burden. All that is required is sufficient support from the public and medical community. The necessary support already exists but has not been adequately voiced.

All who support higher quality pre-hospital emergency care need to make their voices heard to the county commission in the next week. This county deserves the best, but without a show of support will have to settle looked like and what they were up

Seib spoke of one night in particular he spent in a "small, hot cell without windows.'

"There wasn't any reason for me to think I wouldn't be there for months. There was nothing in the track record of the Iranians that would suggest I was going to be out real soon."

The reporter said he came up with three "pretty decent principles," that he would "stick by no matter what happened."

"I decided complete and utter trust in God is probably a good starting point," he said. "The second one was complete honesty. I was debating whether to be tricky with my interrogators, whether to try to tell them what they wanted to hear, whether to try to outsmart them.

"And in the end, I decided I've got nothing to hide. Honesty is the best policy, and I figured I'd stick with it. In the end, I think it was a smart decision," Seib said.

"The third one was don't apologize for who you are or what you are. And if you're going to go down, at least go down with some dignity.

Hatred was one thing Seib said he feared as he left Iran. He said he felt no resentment but only hoped to clear up the differences between the United States and the Middle East.

"There's a problem that Barbara and I wanted to try to correct in the Middle East. It's a simple problem that there's just not enough understanding between our culture and their culture...that's apparent from what happened to me. "We have a lot more in common than we do separating us," Seib said. During questioning afterward, Seib said the Department of State had allowed him and Barbara, also a Journal correspondent in Cairo, Egypt, time for themselves.

Switzer says ties to athletics revealed problems of racism

By LORI LINDSTROM Collegian Reporter

A 13-year-old boy once thought to himself, "If I had wings, I would fly away.

And did he fly.

Veryl Switzer, assistant vice president of minority affairs, was that 13-year-old boy.

Switzer spoke at the Multicultural Festival in Farrell Library Thursday afternoon to a group of 35 people about growing up in an all-black rural town and his personal achievements as a black athlete.

Switzer said his experiences as a student athlete showed him the problems of racism and discrimination when he played football at K-State in the early 1950s. He said it bothered him that he wasn't allowed to be treated as an equal along with his teammates in hotels and restaurants.

"I competed hard to express my disapproval," he said of the racial discrimination.

The hard work paid off. In 1950, he became the second black student to receive an athletic return home," he said. scholarship at K-State. Switzer went on to achieve numerous athletic and academic awards during his collegiate career. Some of his achievements include making first team All-Big Seven in football from 1951 to 1953, and first team All-American in 1953. He was the fourth player selected in the 1954 National Football League draft. Switzer said as an athlete he fought for equal rights and tried to use his athletic career to influence and change views toward blacks. He did open some doors and he did it his way competing on the football field.

After graduation, Switzer played pro football for the Green Bay Packers in 1954-55 and two Canadian professional teams, the Calgary Stampeders in 1958 and the Montreal Alouettes in 1959-60

While at K-State, Switzer said he had academic success because he felt he had the intelligence to do good work and to work hard.

"I was highly motivated to stay in school because it would bring shame to the family if I failed and had to

He said it was important to him to be the first in his family to graduate from college.

Switzer said he also had the "eyes of the nation" on him because he was one of the pioneer black athletes. Competition with his classmates and roommates also challenged him to do well academically, he said.

Switzer said he learned about the "work ethic" at an early age, while growing up on the family farm at Nicodemus, a small town of 700 residents founded in 1877 by freed

He remembers his mother telling him "to be successful and to compete with the whites, you have to be five times better.'

His mother was teaching him about survival, not racism, and he accepted the challenge, he said.

While growing up, Switzer said he was a dreamer and used to tell himself that someday he would prove that he was "someone to reckon" with. He said that football gave him the opportunity to do just that.

Professor shares homeland music

By The Collegian Staff

Native of southern Lebanon, Jihad Racy, professor of music at the University of California, Los Angeles, shared his homeland's music with the public in a concert and lecture Thursday

Racy spoke of his approach to ethnomusicology in the Arab world at a lecture/demonstration Thursday afternoon in McCain Auditorium.

With an audience of nearly 300, Racy discussed "Arab Music: Mode and Improvisation." The focus of the presentation was on "magamat," melodic modes, which are used as the basis for composition and improvisation.

In his comparision of Near Eastern and Western melodic systems, Racy explained that a series of whole and half steps make up all music, while Near Eastern music uses the old legacy of magamat.

'Magamat are melodic patterns in which you play additional in-between notes, not just the black and white," Racy said.

Using such instruments as a "buzug," a banjo-type instrument, and a "nay," a flute-like instrument, Racy went through several scales and improvised melodies. Accompanying Racy on the "darabukkah," a drum-like instrument, was Souhayl Kaspar, an Arab percussionist from Los Angeles

Racy said improvisation is an art that gives music its flavor. Noting that most music is improvisation, Racy compared this music to jazz. To understand improvisation Racy said he had been encouraged to "fool around on the instrument," and he began to develop the aesthetics of improvisation.

A concert was held in connection with the lecture Thursday night in the K-State Union Ballroom.

Calister,

Cats' personal bests fall shy at meet

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Staff

LINCOLN, Neb. - Head track coach John Capriotti knew the Frank Sevigne Husker Invitational indoor track meet Friday and Saturday was going to be highly competitive.

But it turned out to be more competitive than he expected.

"The meet was much tougher than I thought," Capriotti said. "All in all I thought we had a pretty good meet. We had a few personal records, but the competition was just so good about the best you'll find this year (in the college ranks)."

Forty universities from 16 states converged at Bob Devaney Sports Center for the two-day, nationalqualifying event.

During the meet a total of 118 national qualifying marks were reached - 57 by the men and 61 by the women - showing how stiff the competition was for the K-State teams.

Examples of just how "tough" the meet was can be seen across the board in nearly all events K-State athletes participated in.

Felicia Carpenter set a school record in the triple jump at 40 feet, 0 inches, and placed fifth overall.

In the hurdles, Kim Kilpatrick ran a national-qualifying time of 7.92, but placed sixth. Last week, at the Kansas Invitational, she ran the same time and won the event.

In field events, Pinkie Suggs took her first defeat of the season. USC's Diane Clements, a pre-season pick to win the NCAA title, tossed 54-9 to win the shot put. Suggs threw 52-6, a foot less than her best effort. Both are national qualifying marks.

The heavy competition pushed many Wildcat athletes to personal

Ron Stahl captured K-State's only first-place finish in the two-mile run with a personal record of 8:43.2 - 1.5 seconds short of national qualifying. Felicia Carpenter finished sixth in the triple jump, 8 inches short of the national qualifying mark with a school-record leap of 40-0.

Brian Zwahlen continued to improve in the mile, finishing 10th with a personal best of 4:10.07, while Dan O'Mara finished third in the shot put vith a personal best of 47-8.

Other Wildcats placing were Sean Banks, second in the 440-yard dash, and Brad Speer, fourth in the high jump. John Williams finished sixth in the 60-yard dash at 6.32.

Capriotti said many other K-State athletes should have qualified for the finals on Saturday, but failed to because they ran too easy in preliminary races Friday.

"We had some people not qualify for the finals because they went easy on Friday and they got surprised," Capriotti said.

David Warders took 14th in the two-mile run at 9:03.6, and Byron Lopez finished ninth in the three-mile run at 14:18. Dan Meyers and Ken Nash finished eighth and 11th, respectively, in the shot put, and the men's 440-yard relay team finished seventh in 3:18.1.

In women's events, Betsy Silzer finished fifth in the two-mile run at 10:25.38, and Anita Isom took eighth in the 60-yard dash. Anne Stadler, the returning mile champion who is recovering from injury, finished eighth in the mile run and anchored the women's two-mile relay team to a fifth-place finish.

NOTES: Kenny Harrison, K-State's returning NCAA triple jump champion, captured second at the Vitalis Meet at the Meadowlands in East Rutherford, N.J., with a leap of 55-3 — the furthest collegiate jump so far this year...K-State will host the KSU Open indoor track meet Feb. 20-21 in Ahearn Field House. The meet will feature a collegiate division, high school competition and an open division.

lead with an 8-2 mark. Oklahoma and Missouri are one game behind at 7-3, followed by Kansas State, 6-4, Nebraska, 5-5, Iowa State and Oklahoma State, 3-7, and the 1-9 Colorado Buffaloes.

K-State's tennis team drops dual in Topeka

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

Kansas' temperature wasn't the only thing that turned cold this weekend.

K-State's women's tennis team failed to win a set and lost all of its matches Saturday to a tough Texas Tech squad in Topeka, 9-0. It was the official season opener for the Wildcats, now 0-1.

"Texas Tech is awfully good," said K-State Coach Steve Bietau. "KU is the No. 2 team in the (Big Eight) conference and Texas Tech beat them solidly, so we knew we had our hands full."

The doubles team of Valerie

Rive' and Sigrid Ivarsson was not able to repeat as champions after their first-place finish Feb. 8 in the KSU/Pepsi Doubles Invitational, held at the Cottonwood Racquet Club.

In the finals of the invitational, Rive' and Ivarsson defeated teammates Kristy Line and Annika Emtell. But on Saturday, Rive' and Ivarsson lost to Texas Tech's No. 1 team of Anne Marie Walson and Paula Brigance, 6-1,

Line and Emtell fared a little better, but lost to Tech's No. 2 team of Cathy Carlson and Julie Sports Scholarship Fee." In Tuesday's and Wednesday's student elections, 59 percent of the 3,683 K-State students who voted in the elections cast their ballots in favor of the athletic fee, but it was defeated.

Why? Because it didn't win by

The majority of the voting students wanted the fee, but that didn't matter. A two-thirds (nearly 67 percent) majority was needed to pass the bill because there wasn't enough voter interest. About 4,500 student votes were needed for a simple majority

"It's like winning a race by three seconds, but the official says you didn't win, and you ask him why and he tells you that you didn't win by enough," said K-State track coach John Capriotti.

If the bill had passed, revenue would have been used for athletic scholarships in non-revenue sports programs. It would have benefited K-State's baseball, women's basketball, men's and women's golf, track, cross country, women's volleyball and tennis teams. "It's very frustrating, but I'm going to continue to do my job and do the best I can do. It's going to become harder and harder to keep the high quality of the track program up," Capriotti added.

With five of the Big Eight Conference universities - Colorado, Kansas, Oklahoma, Iowa State and Oklahoma State - fully funding their non-revenue sports through student fees, it appears Capriotti is right. How can K-State continue to compete in the conference, much less on a national level?

"We won't be able to fund the programs as fast as we had planned," said K-State Athletic Director Larry Travis. "We were looking for help from the fee in our ability to recruit top athletes.'

Without the fee, K-State won't be able to offer the full number of scholarships that the NCAA allows in each sport. This will make it tough on

Many of the nation's best athletes are not going to be interested in K-State unless they receive a scholarship, whereas they could go elsewhere and receive a scholarship and compete in a quality program at the same time.

What's the use of having these sports since we honestly can't continue to compete successfully? The answer lies in the fact that if K-State wants to remain in the Big Eight, it must keep its non-revenue teams.

K-State has no real choice in the matter. The money necessary to build a team that will be competitive on both conference and national levels should be made available to the respective programs.

"It doesn't hurt the school at all to have these programs," Capriotti

K-State's dream of Big Eight title slips away in loss to NU

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

LINCOLN, Neb. - Nebraska gave K-State's men's basketball team all it could handle - and more - slipping by the Wildcats, 78-76, Saturday at the Bob Devaney Sports Center.

"Nebraska pretty much dictated," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They whipped us whipped us pretty sound."

Nebraska had good reason to want to whip the 'Cats. Earlier this season at Ahearn Field House, in the two teams' Big Eight Conference opener, K-State handed the Cornhuskers their worst defeat in 12 years,

"I wanted this victory real bad," said Nebraska guard Henry Buchanan, who scored a career-high 19 points in the game.
"They kind of embarassed us down there. We wanted it more than K-State."

Nebraska improved to 15-8 overall and 5-5 in the Big Eight.

K-State, trailing by a basket late in the game, stole the ball from Nebraska and worked the ball to Steve Henson for a lastsecond 14-foot shot. The shot bounced off the rim, giving the Cornhuskers the two-point

Kruger said it was a "fair thing to say" K-State is out of the race for the conference championship. The 'Cats, 16-7 overall, dropped to fourth place in the Big Eight at 6-4.

Kansas, which held off Oklahoma at home 86-84, leads the conference at 8-2. OU and Missouri are tied for second at 7-3. K-State has all of these teams - plus Oklahoma State, who lost by one point Saturday to Missouri, 69-68 - left on its schedule.

In the first half at NU, the 'Cats took a 4-0 lead and appeared to be playing sound, aggressive basketball. Turnovers, however, plagued K-State in the early going and the 'Cats could never pull away.

K-State was leading by two late in the half when a technical foul was called on Nebraska's bench. Norris Coleman, the game's high scorer with 25 points, sank two free throws to give the 'Cats a 30-26 lead. Cornhusker fans, upset by the technical foul and previous calls on Keith Neubert and Anthony Bailous, began throwing ice and debris on the court. This prompted Nebraska coach Danny Nee to jump up from the bench, stride to the scorers' table and grab the microphone.

"Please stop throwing stuff," Nee shouted. "Let's play the game. We'll be OK."

After this outburst, Bailous hit a threepoint shot to pull Nebraska within two, 31-29, at the half.

The outburst, though, was just what the Cornhuskers needed to spur them to a vic-

Players reunite on court with past teammate

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

LINCOLN, Neb. - For Mitch Richmond, Charles Bledsoe, K-State basketball assistant coach Dana Altman and Nebraska Conrnhusker Bernard Day, much more than a basketball game was being played between two Big Eight Conference foes Saturday. It was a reunion of three former junior college teammates and their coach. 'K-State is a good team and it's good to see them (Richmond and Bledsoe) and Coach

Altman," Day said. Altman, who came to the Wildcat program this year, coached Richmond, Bledsoe and Day at Moberly (Mo.) Junior College. Altman lured the three highly recruited preps to his program at Moberly where they led his teams to two, top-four NJCCA basketball finishes in the 1984-85 and 1985-86

Moberly days have long since gone, though. Altman brought Bledsoe and Richmond to a new K-State program under Lon Kruger, while Day, a year older in eligibility, went to Nebraska after the 1985 season.

Day said he decided to go Nebraska under the recommendation of Altman, who was close to former Nebraska coach Moe Iba.

"I was hoping that Coach Altman would come up here to coach, but things changed and that didn't happen," Day said. "When I first heard that he and the others were going

Lady Cats tied for Big 8 lead

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

LINCOLN, Neb. - In the latest installment in the topsy-turvy Big Eight Conference women's basketball race, league-leading K-State was trounced Saturday by the Lady Cornhuskers of Nebraska, 77-57.

With this loss the Lady Cats, 7-4 in the conference and 18-6 overall, are locked into a three-way tie for first place in the Big Eight with Nebraska and Missouri.

"I feel good...that we have two (Oklahoma State and Missouri) of our last three games at home," Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman said. Nebraska improved to 14-10 against Nebraska. The Lady Cats jumped out to a 12-10 lead, then fell behind 14-12 and could never get closer than six points for the remainder of the period.

K-State could never get on track

The Lady Cats pulled within two. 37-35, early in the second half, but Nebraska reeled off 12 straight points to pull away.

"We weren't being patient enough early in the game and we forced too many shots," Mossman said. "In the second half, we took good shots but they just wouldn't fall.'

The Lady Huskers, who led by as many as 22 points in the game, were paced by sophomore guard Amy Stephens who scored a game-high 31 points All Rig Eight player Maurtice Ivy and Stacy Imming chipped in 13 points apiece.

K-State was led in scoring by Sue Leiding with 14 points. Carlisa Thomas added 10 points and was the only other Lady Cat in double

K-State shot a mere 38 percent from the field, while Nebraska was much hotter, connecting on almost 55 percent of its shots. The Lady Cats were also outshot at the charity stripe, making five of seven shots. Nebraska was 19 for 25 at the line.

Richmond said playing on the same floor with Day is special to him and Bledsoe since they share some good memories from Moberly days.

AIDS victims' identities protected

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES - Some doctors write misleading death certificates to protect the privacy of AIDS victims, a process made easier by the complex nature of the disease, ex-

"If you know how to play the game and write down any diagnosis or medical term," the likelihood of being caught is very low, said Dr. Shirley Fannin, who is in charge of disease control for Los Angeles County's Department of Health Ser-

The writing of false, misleading or incomplete death certificates to conceal AIDS was spotlighted last week when Riverside County Coroner Raymond Carrillo accused Liberace's doctors of covering up AIDS-related pneumonia as the cause of the entertainer's death Feb. 4.

Carrillo ordered an autopsy on Liberace after rejecting the death certificate written by Dr. Ronald

Daniels, who listed death from cardiac arrest due to heart failure brought on by subacute encephalopathy, or brain degenera-

William Ginsburg, Daniels' lawyer, denied a cover-up. Heart failure was listed, he said, because Liberace's symptoms didn't neatly fit the definition of AIDS, so the doctor decided to resolve doubts about the cause of death in favor of Liberace's privacy.

'Liberace's death has shown that physicians will respect the wishes of people with AIDS and their families. at least some will, and withhold the information," said Dr. Neil Schram, chairman of the Los Angeles City-County AIDS Task Force. If asked, "I would probably try to do so," he added.

Dr. Paul Volberding, San Francisco General Hospital's AIDS research diector, said: "It's not very common for the death certificates to be as misleading as Liberace's apparently was. Usually if there is any attempt to cover the true cause of death, it would be listing pneumonia, respiratory insufficiency or some general term like that, something that is true but not completely the truth."

Acquired immune deficiency syndrome cripples the body's immune system, causing victims to die from pneumonia and other so-called opportunistic infections or cancers.

'Many physicians feel they are doing nothing wrong in reporting the death by pneumonia and protecting privacy rights of patients," said Dr. Jack McCleary, president of the Los Angeles County Medical Association. 'Since AIDS doesn't really kill the patient, they feel they are following the letter of the law.'

"Anyone reading the death certificate who has any medical insight will realize this was an AIDS diagnosis," said Dr. Harry Hollander, AIDS clinic director at the University of California.

Satiric play's humor hidden

By LAURIE FAIRBURN Copy Editor

The floor of the room reads like a blueprint, full-scale, with placement of beds, stools and chairs clearly marked. Everything is a shade of gray: boxes labeled "stew," "coffee," "candy," "wine;" steel furniture with flat, sharp edges; a stack of useless television sets. The players enter purposefully on stage to commence the perplexing action of "Tomorrow, From Any Window."

Play Review

The play is a satire, which means you have to pay acute attention to catch the humor, and even then you might not know when to laugh. It does contain some delightful humor, but the subject from which the humor is derived is too unknown, too full of fear for us to be at ease.

"Tomorrow, From Any Window," performed in Nichols Theatre Feb. 12-14 and Feb. 18-21, is rife with anxiety and confusion, its characters void of purpose. They exist within the confines of one room. But is it a home? A shelter? A prison?

The country is at war. The family watches, sandwiched shoulder to shoulder, pressed against a large picture window. They confer over the mayhem as if it were a sporting event, anticipating the flash of explosives as if it were the Fourth of July. They remain emotionally detached; death does not touch

One must wonder if the horror of war had ever disturbed them before circumstance brought them to view war as entertainment.

The only character who appears to have a grip on the fringe of reality is Hugette, played by Elizabeth Sherby, senior in theater. Hugette is the link to the audience, the glimmer of hope that society wouldn't all go mad. She doesn't venture near the window. During the bombing, she buries her head under her pillow, her limbs hugged tightly to her body. With explosive rage she chastises her mother, father and brother for tolerating an existence she finds sickening.

The father, Gaston, played by Scott Wilbur, graduate student in speech, has a professorial aura - the kind of man who once had a penchant for inductive reasoning. In his current situation, however, he no longer scrutinizes anything, he just accepts it. The mother, Yvonne, played by Jennifer Dohl, graduate student in theater, is a dim-witted woman who can't quite figure out why she can't keep harmony in her family.

Then there is Gerard, the brother/son, played by Paul Craig, junior in theater. Gerard is the equivalent of today's couch potato, only the window serves as his television. He sits mesmerized by the battle; a small broom propped in the crook of his arm is his rifle.

During the course of the play the family is intruded upon by a man named Oscar, played by Dan Shea, senior in radio-television. The family suffers with the obnoxious intruder one point he and Gerard get into a healthy debate over whether war is more beautiful live from a window or

The family also shares the company of two neighbors, Madeleine and Herb. Madeleine, played by Jennifer Hays, sophomore in theater, and Herb, played by Greg Bales, senior in journalism and mass communications, live in another part of the building, without a window. They do, however, have a view of the courtyard, where every morning a firing squad silences a line of prisoners.

The story begins its descent when two soldiers enter the scene and begin shooting machine gun fire from inside the window. With them they bring news that it will soon all be over. Yet, there is no relief in anyone's eyes, no evidence of a weary personal battle with despair near its end.

The play is held together by firstrate performances from every player, including the two soldiers, played by Vincent Cortez Bly, graduate student in theater, and Matthew Mazur, freshman in theater. Every character is disgusting and disturbing and thought-provoking.

The play is, however, difficult to sit through. It is loud, angry and frenzied at times. The audience can feel the stress the characters are under. Indeed, it may be the only way of relating to them, and because of this we are more uncomfortable than we are entertained. It is an event that takes time to absorb and understand, and his ceaseless blabbing, and at but it is definitely worth the effort.

KSDB to sponsor concert series featuring alternative rock bands

By The Collegian Staff

In the coming months, KSDB and Campbell Distributors will be bringing concerts to Manhattan.

The concert series is the brainchild of Rick Darnell, off-air promotions director for KSDB and junior in radio and TV. Darnell said there is a need for live entertainment in Manhattan by bands the students want to hear. He also hopes the concert series will increase awareness of KSDB. "The whole idea of the concert series is to promote KSDB and increase awareness of who we are and what we do," Darnell said. The bands the concert series will attract will mesh with the music often featured on KSDB. Although none have yet been booked, bands being considered include: The Del Fuegos, The Meat Puppets, Blood on the Saddle and The Bo Deans.

Concerts will most likely be held in the Union Ballroom, in which consumption of alcoholic beverages is not allowed. KSDB does not see a major problem in the Union Ballroom policy and anticipates successful concerts, Darnell said.

Promotion for the concert series will be extended to Kansas City, Lawrence, Salina and other surroun-

The first concert is expected to take place in March with additional concerts following throughout the semester. If the concert series is successful it will continue throughout the year.

Campbell Distributors is the local distributor for Budweiser, Busch and Michelob beer. Funding will be sponsored exclusively by Campbell Distributors, which will promote KSDB and a different brand of their beer for each concert.

Representatives from Campbell Distributors think radio promotions will be adequate advertising even though they will not be able to promote or serve beer in the ballroom, Darnell said.

Soviets adjust rights position

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW - Mikhail S. Gorbachev told an international peace conference Monday the Soviet Union is changing its approach to human rights "for all to see," but not because of Western pressure.

The Kremlin leader repeated Soviet opposition to the American space-based defense project known as "Star Wars" and accused the White House of "trampling" on agreements he and President Reagan reached at their 1985 Geneva summit to spur arms control negotia-

There will be "no second Noah's Ark for a nuclear deluge," he said. "We (have) rejected any right for leaders of a country, be it the U.S.S.R., the U.S. or another, to pass a death sentence on mankind.

"We are not judges and the billions of people are not criminals to be punished, so the nuclear guillotine must be broken."

Soviet arms control proposals show his government's "and preparedness to give up its status of a nuclear power and reduce all other weapons to a minimum of reasonable sufficiency."

Gorbachev delivered his hour-long address in the Grand Kremlin Palace on the final day of a world that brought about 1,300 Soviet and foreign scientists, film stars, doctors, businessmen and other public figures together in Moscow.

He did not make new proposals on disarmament, as some had predicted, but stressed Soviet proposals made at the Reykjavik summit last October and a plan he announced in January 1986 for eliminating nuclear weapons by the year 2000.

Gorbachev indicated the Soviet Union would resume nuclear tests following an 18-month freeze.

He got a warm reception from the audience crowded into the creamcolored Kremlin hall and was interrupted 20 times by applause.

Actor Gregory Peck, writer Norman Mailer, economist John Kenneth Galbraith and musician Yoko Ono were among Americans who sat at burnished wood desks in the room where the Supreme Soviet, the nation's nominal parliament, customarily meets.

Andrei Sakharov, who won the 1975 Nobel Peace Prize and is the bestknown Soviet dissident, sat in the middle row of the hall. He shook hands with other delegates and signed autographs on business cards and

The 65-year-old physicist, attending his first Kremlin-sponsored conference, called in a speech Saturday for "an open and democratic" Soviet Union as a way to increase trust between the superpowers.

Gorbachev did not address human rights in detail, but said, "our new approach to the humanitarian problems ... is there for all to see. And I must disappoint those who think that en the result of pre on us from the West, that we want to gain somebody's fancy in pursuit of some ulterior motive. No, we do

The two student body presidential run-off candidates spent a majority of their time agreeing with each other during a debate sponsored by the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee.

Michele Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, and Kent Bradley, junior in nutrition science, spoke to about 25 students Monday night in the Union Little Theatre.

The candidates gave opening and closing statements and answered questions for about an hour.

"All the candidates have agreed that the key role of the student body president is to represent the students of Kansas State University and the University," Bradley said.

Benoit said she would place an article in the Collegian and/or have a half-hour program on KSDB each week to keep students informed of current issues

Bradley said he would concentrate on visiting student organizations, but also cited the Collegian as a possible outreach for student government. After the campaign is over the student body president should "keep lines of communication open through the Collegian (and) through every resource possible," he said.

It is important for the student body president to aid in retention and recruitment by talking with potential and current students, Bradley said.

To do this, the president must have "thorough knowledge of the programs this University has to offer and how they effect the students," he said.

Bradley learned about the vast array of offerings at K-State through a class he took and by being president of the Student Alumni Board. He said he has also gained experience by lobbying on the state and national level and serving on the College of Human Ecology Council. Benoit said she believes the student body president should be experienced and should utilize the executive cabinet.

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Staff Writer

Questions raised about police surveillance at a Jan. 28 rally were "very valid," the superintendent of the K-State Police told Students in Solidarity with Central America members Monday night.

"I have a great deal of admiration and appreciation for people who stand up and express their views openly and freely," Charles Beckom told the group at their regular meeting in the Union. "You've raised viable questions. I'm willing to work with you."

The incident was "something we both can share and learn a little from," he said.

Beckom was addressing complaints made after campus police videotaped the Anti-Contra Aid/Response to the State of the Union Address Rally sponsored by SISCA.

Beckom said he realized the surveillance was intimidating, but said it was sometimes necessary for students' benefit.

"Our purpose was not to intimidate - it was to protect," he told SISCA members. "You may be the target of a disruption. We've seen that here not once, but many times."

Because of a federal law, he said campus police cannot disseminate information to courts without a valid

"We do not give information out randomly," he said.

Beckom said the issue of surveillance could be debated forever, but "that's not going to dissolve it." Saying he wanted to "dispel the myths" about surveillance, Beckom said certain campus events generate a great deal of animosity. Political issues are generally more susceptible to surveillance than other issues, he said. "When you deal in politics, the issues aren't the same as when someone is talking about Mickey Mouse or Donald Duck," he said. "These kind of events are becoming targets of violent acts.' Though several other events occurred on campus that week, Beckom said the SISCA rally was the only one in which he could get no confirmation that there would be no problems.

"We couldn't get a response," he said. "That indicated a guessing game as to what may have happen-

Siege of Lebanese camps continues

By The Associated Press BEIRUT, Lebanon - Shiite

Moslems lifted a four-month blockade Monday and let food trucks enter two small Palestinian refugee camps in south Lebanon, but there was no indication of an end to the camp siege in Beirut.

The United Nations said the four trucks unloaded 47 tons of flour, 90,000 cans of sardines and 564 canisters of skim milk in al-Bass and Bourj el-Shamali near the port of

Slattery opposes education cuts, legislative wage increases

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER Staff Writer

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., said he would give away whatever pay raise he receives from Congress should one be approved this year. "I've decided that whatever increase I get this year as a result of this last pay raise, whether it's $5,000 or $10,000 or whatever it is, I'm either going to give it to the federal government for deficit reduction or I'm going to give it to charity," he

news conference Monday at the Manhattan Public Library, Juliette and Poyntz avenues. Slattery was in Manhattan as a part of a series of Kansas town hall meetings.

He opened the news conference with a prepared statement about the education budget proposals made by President Ronald Reagan's administration for 1987 and 1988. Between 1,000 and 2,000 students could be affected by the proposed cuts in financial assistance at K-State, Slattery said. "Students at K-State would have to make serious choices about whether to continue their education or not," he said.

Slattery said the budget cuts in higher education could seriously affect the United States' ability to compete in "a world marketplace."

"I think it's important for us to keep in mind that if we're going to be serious about being competitive in a global economy then we'd better be prepared to make the kind of investment that I think is absolutely essential to the education of the next generation," he said. Currently, the United States spends about 0.85 percent of the $1 trillion federal budget on student financial assistance programs, Slattery said.

President Reagan has proposed cutting that portion of the federal budget to 0.45 percent, he said.

'Specifically, he's (Reagan) talking about a 45 percent cut in all the student financial assistance programs," Slattery said.

He said the federal government is spending less in nominal dollars on education today than in 1981. Nominal dollars are actual dollars, not adjusted for inflation.

Slattery said the federal budget cut would mean cuts in the following programs; a 60 percent cut in the Guaranteed Student Loan program, total elimination of the Perkins Direct Loan program (National Direct Student Loan), total elimination of the work-study program and a 31 percent cut in Pell Grants.

Although the president has proposed these cuts, it does not mean Congress will go along with them, he

"I don't believe these kind of cuts will be accepted by the Congress," Slattery said. "I am strongly opposed to the kind of cuts."

Slattery also spoke about the proposed cuts in the Agricultural Extension Service. The extension service supports programs and services including 4-H youth organizations, the Soil Conservation Service and Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service. Slattery said the president's budget was calling for a 21 percent cut in extension service's budget, which would mean a 17 percent budget cut for the service in Kansas.

Shiite faction denies Waite hostage

BEIRUT, Lebanon - The Iranian-backed Shiite Moslem faction Hezbollah on Monday denied allegations that it holds Anglican Church hostage negotiator Terry Waite, who dropped from sight nearly a month ago.

Walid Jumblatt, leader of the Druse militia responsible for Waite's security, had accused the militant group of taking Waite captive. American Moslem M.T. Mehdi, visiting Lebanon to seek the release of hostages, called for a U.S.-led embargo on arms sales to the Middle East as a means to help end Lebanon's 11-year-old civil war and kidnappings of foreigners. Twenty-six foreigners are missing in Lebanon, including eight Americans.

The statement issued by Hezbollah, or Party of God, said: "We strongly deplore the accusation by Mr. Jumblatt concerning our involvement in the abduction of...Terry Waite."

"We like to believe that this was an unintentional error made to still the appetite of the Western press, which is gasping after anything new about the hostages held in Lebanon.

"We appreciate Mr. Jumblatt's embarrassment over Waite's abduction. But he fully realizes that we do not know any more than he does about the kidnappers who were said to be negotiating with the Anglican emissary."

Filming of Cronkite's trip restricted

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa - Former CBS anchorman Walter Cronkite arrived in South Africa on Monday, but South African authorities refused to let CBS News film his visit.

Cronkite, who is still active with CBS News, said he planned to meet prominent South Africans, including government and opposition leaders.

He said the government issued him a restricted visa that apparently prevents CBS from filming his interviews and travels. "No photography," he said when asked about the restrictions.

But Cronkite said he plans reports based on information gathered during his five-day visit.

Under an 8-month-old state of emergency, the South African government has banned or restricted reporting about anti-apartheid unrest, security force actions, treatment of detainees, most forms of peaceful protest and a broad range of statements the government considers subversive. It has also attached conditions to the visas of some visitors, including journalists.

House approves tuition legislation

TOPEKA - The Kansas House Monday gave first-round approval to bills that would ease eligibility requirements students must meet to pay in-state tuition at state universities and allow Kansas savings and loan institutions to establish branches outside of the state.

The measures were among a handful of proposals the House tentatively approved after virtually no debate and forwarded for final action today.

Under the tuition bill, the State Board of Regents would be allowed to exempt certain people from paying non-resident university tuition and fees, which generally are more than double the rates for Kansas residents.

The measure would allow all people who enroll in one of the six state universities of Kansas Technical Institute within 12 months of graduation from an accredited Kansas high school to be eligible for for resident tuition rates.

Gates to face intense questioning

WASHINGTON — When career intelligence analyst Robert Gates was named to the No. 2 job in the CIA last April he promised to help maintain "mutual trust, candor and respect" between the spy agency and Congress

Now that he has been nominated to replace the ailing William J. Casey as director of the Central Intelligence Agency, the 43-year-old Gates is prepared to make that pledge again, but the circumstances have changed drastically.

The confirmation hearing that starts today - Gates' second in less than a year - will be held in the shadow of the Iran-Contra affair and the suspicion it has stirred that the CIA has demonstrated a lack of candor and trust.

Gates faces intense questioning on the extent of the CIA's knowlege of the diversion of arms sale profits to Nicaragua's Contra rebels and whether he and his agency were completely forthcoming about it.

The central question last April and now is this: Is the CIA prepared to submit to the congressional oversight process and to report in a timely manner on all its operations, even the most sensitive and

Sen. David Boren, D-Okla., the Intelligence Committee's new chairman, said last week it has become clear that the Iran-Contra affair marked a low point in the rocky history of relations between Con-

'McCarthy' tactics force departure

WASHINGTON - A veteran diplomat said Monday he was forced to resign from the State Department because of "McCarthyite" tactics used against him by the chief of the Latin American affairs

Francis J. McNeil, 54, a former ambassador to Costa Rica, said Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams "suggested I was untrustworthy and, in effect, disloyal."

Interviewed separately by NBC-TV and the Associated Press, McNeil said Abrams accused him of undercutting the administration's foreign policy by suggesting that the U.S.-backed Nicaraguan Contra guerrillas were not doing well.

He also said he was the target of an investigation aimed at finding out who was responsible for two press leaks in 1985. One disclosed prematurely the nomination of Otto Reich as ambassador to Venezuela; the other, a classified State Department position paper on Central America.

McNeil, who resigned early this month and whose last post was deputy director of intelligence, said he was exonerated after a months-long investigation.

Method may aid amnesia recovery

CHICAGO - A woman with a form of amnesia that left her unable to retain new information was able to learn enough about computers to get a job, thanks to an experimental technique for instilling unconscious memories, a researcher says.

The accomplishment "suggests there is some hope for teaching amnesia patients complex new knowledge, even though they might not remember they had learned the knowledge," said Daniel Schacter, assistant psychology professor at the University of Toron-

Schacter's work focused on "anterograde" amnesia, in which the victim has difficulty recalling information presented since the

The problem is frequent after severe head injuries, and "many, many thousands" of people have some degree of it following such injuries, encephalitis, ruptured blood vessels in the brain or other causes, Schacter said.

Local government lobbyists request repeal of wage law

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Lobbyists for contractors and local units of government urged the Senate Labor, Industry and Small Business Committee Monday to endorse a bill repealing Kansas' 95-year-old prevailing wage law.

They said the law, which makes contractors pay workers the prevailing wage for their speciality in the locality of a project and to build that cost into their bids, is antiquated, inflates the cost of public works projects in the state and is detrimental to workers because it stymies in-

The committee took no action on the measure Monday, and will hear opponents Tuesday. In the past, lobbyists for labor unions have strongly opposed abolishing the law, arguing it is needed to insure quality workmanship and to prevent employers from importing cheap outside labor to take jobs away from Kansans member of the Joint Committee on State Building Construction, which introduced the bill, told the Senate panel he supports the bill because he believes it drives up construction costs paid by state taxpayers.

Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Lenexa, a past

He said a repair job on roofs of buildings at Emporia State University three years ago would have cost the state 32 percent more if the state had not waived the use of federal funds, which required using the prevailing wage.

Stewart Entz, representing Associated Contractors of Kansas, said the law originally was enacted to prevent railroads from bringing in oriental workers who would work long hours for low pay and take jobs away from Kansas workers.

"The idea of importing cheap foreign labor is a thing of the past,' said Entz. "Studies show this law contributes substantially to construction costs. If it is carried on, it's going to cost taxpayers tremendous-

Director plans aid for city's economy

By TOM DENZEL Collegian Reporter

In an attempt to slow the Kansas economic slump, the University has created the position of director of economic development. Newly appointed director Bill Muir will concentrate on attracting industry and research to the Manhattan area.

"The University is a type of think tank for the state and community,' said Bill Muir, a 1971 graduate of K-State. Muir will work with state agencies to develop strategies to better utilize the University's resources.

Muir joined the KSU Foundation Feb. 2 after serving eight years in former Gov. John Carlin's administration as comptroller and special assistant to the governor.

Muir's position, created by University President Jon Wefald and Foundation President Art Loub, is designed to strengthen and develop communication links between the University, business and industry.

"We are extremely fortunate to have attracted someone with Bill Muir's abilities and experience to this new position," Loub said.

One of Muir's plans is to attract non-polluting industries to a proposed industrial park that would be located in the Manhattan area, he

The Foundation has already created an economic development research triangle in a project, Technipark, which is a mutual effort between the University, private industry and governmental units.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture's Grain Marketing Research Laboratory, the American Institute of Baking, which moved research facilities to Manhattan from Chicago, the Kansas Wheat Commission, the Manhattan Medical Center Office Park and the Kansas Artificial Breeding Service Unit have all located in the Technipark.

The combination of University, government and private research and education programs have made Manhattan the world's leading grain science center.

Muir said he hopes the new industrial park he is planning will attract more business and industry to Manhattan and the state - spurring the economic growth and development of Kansas.

'The state of Kansas has recognized the importance of the Universitycommunity-state cooperation in economic development, and this is why I'm here," Muir said.

Muir will act as a liaison with non-University agencies and task forces concerned with the economic development in Manhattan and the Muir will be working with the eight colleges, graduate office and University administration to define the areas of the University's expertise with economic development or commerical potential, and assist in formulating a program that will broaden and promote those areas.

"With his vast knowledge of Kansas government, the political system and the state's business and industry opportunities, he will help lead this University into the pending era of economic development. His association with various University projects underlines his dedication to K-State," Loub said.

"I am fortunate to have the opportunity to serve my alma mater in this position and feel privileged to work with such a professional staff," Muir

Muir will also be coordinating all fund-raising activities and will work with the director of Corporate and

Minimum markup law unfair to store owners

Kansas retail liquor stores may decrease if it is decided that the current mandatory minimum markup law violates federal laws against price fixing and monopolies. Currently, Kansas retail liquor store owners are forced to mark up the price of their products ranging from 40.5 to 28.5 percent. The current law has been in effect since 1961, when it was passed to protect owners of small liquor stores and decrease consumption.

Last week, Attorney General Bob Stephen announced the current Kansas law may be in violation of federal laws and that the prosecution of liquor store owners who do not mark up their

> It hardly seems fair to tax one product solely because of what it is. If liquor store owners can make a greater profit by selling their product at a lower price, they should be allowed to set their own price.

The real issue now is whether the Kansas law can be enforced or if it must be changed. We believe that taxing responsible patrons and denying retailers' profits is not a responsible stance.

Annual 'vein drain' draws near

Can you feel the excitement mounting across campus, the community, in fact all of Wildcat land? Some people attribute it to Wednesday's student body president run-off election, others think it must have something to do with Thursday's Wildcat invasion of Beak 'Em Hill, but most of us know the real source of excitement. Next week the K-State Bloodmobile will be here!

No, it's not a cruel joke or a fantasy that's too good to be true. It's time to get psyched for the event of the semester. More fun than a truckload of monkeys - that's the K-State

If you think about it, February is a happening kind of month. Not only do we get to celebrate Valentine's Day, Washington's and Lincoln's birthdays, but we get to jam at the brouhaha known as the blood drive.

I know it. Don't say it. It's more fun than humans should be allowed to have.

In a guest column last semester, I tried to convince you, the students, faculty and staff of Kansas State University that donating blood is a nice, nay a thrilling, experience. Do you believe a few people actually listened to me? My dear friend Bill once said to me, "You know, Char, what fools these mortals

But seriously, I'm due for my gallon pin this summer and look at me. On second thought, you'd probably be better off not looking at me, so rather take me as an example. I'm still around to talk about the wonder and even the magic of giving blood.

I remember the first time I donated. It was the summer before my freshman year here at K-State. I don't tell just anybody this, but I first drained my veins in Junction City (yes, at the Bloodmobile). A bunch of friends forced me at gunpoint and threated the life of my first born if I would not cooperate. (No, mom, I haven't had a kid I haven't told you about). Thus I was persuaded to donate.

Though when I first walked into the donation site I would have rather been eating 5 pounds of raw liver and/or canned spinach, I found the experience to be quite rewarding. Besides being fed all the junk food I wanted, I gained the much-deserved attention of a group of gorgeous men. (OK, so I made up the bit about the men. It was only one kind-of-

Anyway, look at me now. I have the uniquely wonderful opportunity to convince you all to be all that you can be, and join the ranks of the few, the proud, the blood donors.

OK, so you're still not convinced this is for you. Well, let me tell ya, if you show up, you could rub elbows with some pretty happening people. Lon Kruger, Larry Travis, University Vice Presidents William Sutton and Robert Krause, Student Body President Steven Johnson and Student Senate Chairwoman Sal "what a gal, she's my pal" Traeger will be donating. Barb Kruger and Norris (must I mention a last name?) Coleman will be volunteers. Provost Owen Koeppe and Willie the Wildcat will be hanging around, watching people bleed. And (true excitement) Jack Hartman, the man behind the legend, is our honorary chairman.

(Those of you pressed for time please skip this paragraph. A friend o' mine, Mike Kadel, said that if I mentioned his name in the column he'd donate on his birthday. If you know Fisc, please feel free to haze him about this.)

What more could a person ask for? We've got America at its best - free food, great company, live entertainment (me) and the National Enquirer. The Bloodmobile will be next week, Tuesday through Friday from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. on the second floor of the Union. Please join the fun of the star-studded gala event we affectionately call the K-State Bloodmobile. You can give the gift of life.

Farrell badly needs some help

I have finally had it. I really try not to complain about the complications, injustices and hardships that life often throws at me in its attempt to make me a stronger person, but enough is enough.

It happened last weekend. There I stood, sweat dripping down my forehead, perched precariously on the ancient wooden slats of the floor in the stacks of Farrell Library. As I peered through the rickety slats at the floor below, I suddenly realized that almost four hours had passed and I had found not one of the dozen or so books and journals needed to begin research on one of my many research papers for this semester.

The sweat continued to drip down my face - the heat level in the stacks and most of Farrell is oppressive and almost unbearable. Still looking in between the slats of the floor, I nervously began to wonder about the strength of the slats. It occurred to me that I could faint from being overcome by the heat, fall behind one of these book shelves that I know nobody has been behind in months, and I probably would not be discovered for weeks. That was it.

I looked around the stacks for a window because not only would I have loved some fresh air at the moment, but I suddenly felt the urge to scream out the window "I'm mad as hell and I'm not gonna take it anymore!" No window was to be found, so after making my way back out of that deep, dark deserted maze that truly is the stacks, I left Farrell having once again gotten nowhere with my research

As a graduate student who has been attending K-State a mere 11/2 years, I have come to loathe every minute I have to spend in Farrell. It is a very sad example of a university library As a child, I grew up with my nose in a book. I love to read and I especially love libraries. You can go to any library and descend into another world - any world you want. Information and knowledge abound at libraries and, for me, it's a pleasure to be surrounded by lots of things to read.

So, in my search to find out why I cannot stand researching at Farrell, I eliminated the possibility that perhaps the problem lies with me. I love to read and I love to write, so my dread of being trapped in the stacks for hours was not rooted in me I hate to say it folks, but it's Farrell. For being a leading Midwest university, K-State should be embarrassed to have a library like Farrell. It is understaffed, underequipped and simply not of a caliber equivalent to that of an excellent university like K-State.

For example, the branch libraries chemistry, architecture and design, math/physics and veterinary medical - are an added plus to the Farrell system, but they usually are most helpful to only those students in those disciplines

And those wretched stacks! This particular part of Farrell needs to be rebuilt with special attention being given to the air ventilation system. I have in mind a modern structure with lots of space to move around in, pleasant wall colors and windows to view the outside world when one needs a bit of inspiration.

As for the contents of Farrell, it leaves a lot to be desired as well. Farrell's current number of published volumes of reading material is just over the one million mark as of December 1986. That number doesn't impress me much when virtually every other book I pull off the shelf is dated anywhere from the mid-1800s to the mid-1900s. Many of my fellow students and I have discussed this particular point about Farrell at great lengths and have come to the conclusion that the best major to be in at K-State has got to be history. Farrell can keep a history major knee deep in yellow-paged where I have gone searching through the second floor of Farrell then out into the dreaded stacks only (and inevitably) to find the particular periodical I need is nowhere to be found. Or worse yet, I finally get a hold of a periodical which will be useful to my research, and the pages are torn out of the particular article I need. I could just scream.

Periodicals are a whole other matter to tangle with. There have been dozens of times

K-Staters are in desperate need of a good, general research library where the entire University body could have excess to modern as well as historical published material. Most university libraries I have visited are very comfortable, modern and inspiring to be in. It is very hard to be studious when you're looking at walls that are mental institution-green while probing through books whose pages crumble to the touch and, at the same time, trying to keep the beads of sweat on your forehead from messing up your glasses.

Because the state dictates the budget of the University's library, the pressure must be brought on Kansas legislators to get any kind of approval for this badly needed undertaking. When one looks at K-State and takes a close look at Farrell and then glances over at the new coliseum being built, one can easily see where our priorities are.

Farrell has its good points, no doubt. However, when K-State is looked at as a whole, Farrell is the proverbial ugly duckling in the middle of a lot of beautiful swans. I know, money is short and times are hard when it comes to getting funding for Kansas' universities. But what of our priorities? Aren't we here to grow as much as we possibly can intellectually?

Education - quality education - needs attention on this campus, not sports, for example. The powers that be in Topeka have lost track of quality, and K-State's Farrell Library is living proof of that.

Program to encourage faculty research By SALLY NEARY

Collegian Reporter President Jon Wefald announced a new faculty development program funded by the KSU Foundation has been established to enable faculty to conduct research. The program will award small grants to individual faculty to support faculty exchange programs with foreign universities to encourage faculty to accept summer seminars and to fund artistic materials and research equipment.

When Wefald took office in July, he applied to the Foundation for immediate help for three high-priority needs. Of the $700,000 allocated by the Foundation to support these three needs, $200,000 was set aside for the faculty development pro-

K-State currently participates with

Justus Leibig University, Giessen, West Germany, in a faculty exchange program. Examples of other agreements which have been signed and are in the planning stages include universities in Munich, France and Switzerland.

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said K-State has offered a number of faculty exchange agreements with foreign universitites. However, in the past, these programs haven't gotten underway because of lack of funds.

"It's important for the faculty to have access to the grants," Reagan

Grants of up to $3,000 have been set aside to assist these exchanges. With this financial support, the faculty is encouraged to participate, and faculty from other universities are encouraged to come here.

The National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities and the National Science Foundation summer seminars will also be supplemented with financial help. Previously, when faculty were chosen to attend these summer seminars, they were forfeiting a chance to teach summer school. They received a typical stipend of about $3,500 for eight weeks and $2,750 for six weeks, but the stipend was not enough to cover all the

"This was a financial disincentive," Reagan said. He said by supplementing these fellowships by $1,500, the financial disincentive would be removed and more faculty would be encouraged to attend a summer seminar.

Small research grants will also be awarded to faculty for research equipment, materials for artistic production or research-related travel. The dean of the college must write letters of recommendation in support of their faculty's application and put the applications in a priority

The deans must also indicate if the department is willing or able to contribute any college money on the project. In the final decision, newer faculty members and members in a field where opportunities for outside funding are few will be favored. The funding will have a $5,000 limit.

"We want to help as many faculty (members) as possible," Reagan said. He said the administration wanted to issue the grants to a wide variety of departments across campus in order to get the most benefits from the funding.

"The need for this program is great," Reagan said. "I think there will be an enormous response to it."

Greek house plans reopening next fall

By KARI COMPTON Collegian Reporter

The Iota chapter of Alpha Kappa Lambda fraternity will reopen its doors in fall 1987 after a year of planning and reorganization.

The national headquarters and the AKL alumni association decided to close the fraternity's house, 1919 Hunting Ave., and reorganize before the entire operation at K-State folded, said Greg Wannemuehler, professional staff member at the fraternity's national headquarters.

But the national organization didn't want to lose the K-State chapter because of K-State's rich tradition in the Greek system, he said.

Program to encourage faculty research By SALLY NEARY

President Jon Wefald announced a new faculty development program funded by the KSU Foundation has been established to enable faculty to conduct research.

Collegian Reporter

The program will award small grants to individual faculty to support faculty exchange programs with foreign universities to encourage faculty to accept summer seminars and to fund artistic materials and research equipment.

When Wefald took office in July, he applied to the Foundation for immediate help for three high-priority needs. Of the $700,000 allocated by the Foundation to support these three needs, $200,000 was set aside for the faculty development pro-

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said K-State has offered a number of faculty exchange agreements with foreign universitites. However, in the past, these programs haven't gotten underway because of lack of funds

Grants of up to $3,000 have been set aside to assist these exchanges. With this financial support, the faculty is encouraged to participate, and faculty from other universities are encouraged to come here.

The National Endowment for the

Previously, when faculty were chosen to attend these summer seminars, they were forfeiting a chance to teach summer school. Small research grants will also be awarded to faculty for research equipment, materials for artistic production or research-related travel. The dean of the college must write letters of recommendation in support of their faculty's application and put the applications in a priority

The deans must also indicate if the department is willing or able to contribute any college money on the project. In the final decision, newer faculty members and members in a field where opportunities for outside funding are few will be favored. The funding will have a $5,000 limit.

"We want to help as many faculty (members) as possible," Reagan said. He said the administration wanted to issue the grants to a wide variety of departments across campus in order to get the most benefits from the funding.

"The need for this program is great," Reagan said. "I think there will be an enormous response to it."

Writing own vows creates special ceremony

By SARAH KESSINGER Arts & Entertainment Editor

Most weddings are unique in their own little way. Couples plan differently and step up to the altar or in front of the judge with their own ideas about what the marriage ceremony and its legal ties will

In Manhattan, trends vary. The marriage ceremony often doesn't break with "traditional" ideas of a wedding, while writing vows appears to be a change that has caught on. Lack of time to plan and the conservative nature of people are reasons why couples don't veer from the mainstream.

The Rev. Ron Clingenpeel of St. Francis Episcopal Campus Ministry said the trend

these days is toward "yuppie weddings."
"I think something important and prevailing for many young people is the yuppie lifestyle they want," Clingenpeel said. "They want more of the fancy dresses, tuxedos and classical music. They'll very rarely ask for out-of-the-way

Although he did officiate at one wedding in the Quinlan Nature Area last year where guests came in T-shirts and blue jeans, Clingenpeel said couples in this area usually conform to the standards of the day.

"The students these days are more willing to conform to what society imposes on them and don't tend to push out against it," he said.

While working in Montana, Clingenpeel officiated at weddings outdoors in the mountains or in the couples' cabins.

"Lots of the weddings had country and bluegrass music and were in places important to the people. It made sense to do

Clingenpeel also said ethnic ties in this area aren't as strong and couples don't look to their heritage for ideas for out-ofthe-ordinary elements in their weddings.

Dave Stewart, minister at the Baptist Campus Center, said he has never done a ceremony out of the book, but works with the couples on writing their own vows.

"We write the vows together," Stewart said. "I try to let them have their input on every element of the service."

Stewart called one unique ceremony he officiated a "gathering and celebration of friends." There was a coffee beforehand at which Stewart announced the beginning of the wedding.

"The couple and I marched in and then we watched the rest of the family and friends come in. The ceremony was built around the couple, and everyone had an opportunity to share in it," Stewart said. 'I think folks are really working to give a ceremony meaning, uniquely their own,"

Among some of the married or engaged students on campus, few said they had or wanted anything in their weddings that would break with traditional ideas of a church wedding.

Bride-to-be Patty Dam, senior in nutrition and exercise science, said her wedding plans were "pretty normal," although the mothers of both parties will give Dam and her fiance away at the altar.

Trying to plan a wedding and attend school have limited Dam's time for considering nontraditional ideas for her ceremony, she said.

Tony Jurich, professor of human development and family studies and

clinical director of marriage and family therapy at the K-State Family Center, said the biggest change he has noted is writing

"Before it was 'love, honor and obey," and that was a real big thing," Jurich said. Some people think this reflects sexism and choose to write their own vows to better suit their situation.

"This also means that the control is going with the couple in many cases now, instead of the most powerful person at the wedding - the bride's mother," he said. "However, more of this doesn't necessarily mean most of the weddings are this

Jurich also said the groom is opting to get more involved in the wedding these

"It's no longer just the bride's show," Jurich said. "More men want to have a role in the planning."

Practical wedding gifts high priority on wish list

By TERESA TEMME Staff Writer

Bridal registries have always been a traditional part of the wedding plan, but in recent years some registries have added a practical twist as couples seek out non-traditional stores in which to place their desired orders.

Joni Smith, department manager of domestics at Wal-Mart Discount Cities, 628 Tuttle Creek Blvd., said she thinks this new trend among couples is a resuit of high prices in most traditional gift shops with bridal registries.

"I started the registry at Wal-Mart two years ago, when I was planning my own wedding," Smith said. "The prices they wanted (in the gift shops) were unreasonable.

Smith said another reason she started a registry at Wal-Mart was because there was no place in Manhattan where a couple could register for bedding sup-

She said most couples register for basic supplies such as sheets, curtains, bedding, dishes and appliances. The merchandise that is available for registering is located in the domestics and houseware departments, Smith said.

True Value Hardware, 1221 Westloop Place, is another non-traditional store that has offered a bridal registry since

"The advantage of registering at True Value is it offers a very good selection of the basic appliances which are needed to start a house, and these appliances are available in a wide variety of prices," said Deniece Guinn, gift department manager at True Value

Guinn said couples should come to the store to register about six to eight weeks before the wedding. She said if the couple comes in too early, the merchandise may change before the wed-

Campbell's, 1227 Moro St., which has been in the bridal registry business for about 25 years, doesn't seem to be suffering from the recent development of non-traditional stores offering bridal registries.

Betty Campbell, owner of Campbell's, said a lot of change in what couples look for has taken place over the years but just as many couples buy fine china today as when the store first offered the bridal registry.

However, Campbell said, "Fewer girls are registering for sterling silver. They are purchasing more silverplate and stainless steel."

Campbell said new trends in merchandise chosen for registries include more gold trim on stainless steel and flatware, black trim on china and more contemporary styles in china. She said one example of a style no longer in fashion is the colored glassware popular 15 years ago.

Marital customs rely on traditional values

Champagne-fountain receptions and brides in white flowing gowns are American traditions. But in a city like Manhattan, with representatives from 93 countries, America's traditions aren't necessarily the norm.

Since Western wedding ceremonies are ot internationally practiced, as some believe, students and faculty coming to K-State from other countries sometimes find it difficult to follow their own wedding

In China, for example, brides adorn themselves in deep red. As opposed to Western cultures' white gowns of purity, the deep red colors are considered to be a sign of luck, said Catherine Fung, doctoral candidate in adult and occupational educa-

The Chinese bride's gowns are also very elaborate in design.

'The richer the family, the more elaborate the gown," Fung said.

The bride also wears a crown, not a veil.

This crown is worn to signify honor. The official pronouncement of marriage usually occurs in a public place, such as an auditorium. After this, a ceremony takes place where the bride must pay her respect to the groom's parents.

"Paying respect sometimes just consists of pouring tea for the bridegroom's parents, but it could go as far as kneeling in front of them," Fung said.
Fung, who is Chinese but was born in Vietnam, said Vietnamese weddings are similar to Chinese weddings because the Vietnamese people adapted many Chinese

Most Vietnamese or Chinese students getting married in Manhattan would probably have a Western wedding because of their Americanization, she said. "If they did want a traditional wedding, however, it would be difficult because they would have to get the proper gown, crown, etc." In Botswana, South Africa, two wedding practices are common - one traditional and one more modern, said Donald Modiri Mmofswa, freshman in agronomy. The modern practice is for the couple to register with the district commissioner of "We go there and sign some papers and then we are married," he said. All the arrangements of the "signing" must be made and cleared with the parents of both the bride and groom, however. The families also must be present at the district commissioner's office. "The bride and groom each has to have a representative from their family present (when they sign the papers)," Mmofswa

The parents are responsible for all the arrangements of traditional weddings in Botswana. They decide when the wedding will be, where it will take place and what type of food will be served.

The couple is officially married after a preacher has prayed for them in the

"Then they are married," Mmofswa said. "They don't have to sign anything."

Managing a relationship, jobs in two cities

Commuting strains relationships

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Staff Writer

Absence makes the heart grow fonder. Though everyone has heard that ageold expression, not many get a chance to

The term "commuter marriage" refers to employed spouses who spend at least three nights a week in separate residences and yet are still married and intend to remain so, according to Naomi Gerstel and Harriet Gross, authors of "Commuter Marriages."

The separation is a result of participation by both husband and wife in careers that involve commitments to different geographic locations.

In commuter marriages, spouses choose to live apart while at the same time meeting professional and career goals. While professional careers may be enhanced, the disadvantages of a commuter marriage may be costly, said Candyce Russell, professor of human development and family studies.

'The stability of a relationship is very much tested in a commuter marriage."

Barbara Stowe

The greatest disadvantage is a loss of emotional support, Russell said. Though couples may speak to each other several times a week, the intimacy is not often

"You lose that sense of rhythm," she said.

Another loss is the routine, face-to-face interactions many couples share daily, Russell said.

Most couples say they need at least one weekend together every four or five weeks. Without that, Russell said, some begin to lose the feeling of being married. One of the best ways of coping with a commuter marriage is in knowing the situation is temporary, Russell said. When couples know they will be together in the future, they have something to look forward to. In the initial separation period, studies show that men tend to have more problems adjusting to their lifestyle than women, Russell said.

"It's as though they can't seem to concentrate on their work," she said.

Not only can commuter marriages be emotionally trying, they can be financially draining as well, Russell said. Maintenance costs for two homes, phone and gas bills, and airline ticket payments tend to add up quickly.

Commuters say they are constantly confronted by others who expect that they will discard monogamy and take advantage of their new-found possibilities for sexual freedom, Gerstel and Gross

People who use that as an excuse for having an affair are simply attempting justify or excuse their behavior Studies have shown no evidence that commuting causes affairs, they said.

In some cases, Russell said, couples found advantages in living apart. Those couples reported a renewed "honeymoon effect" and a greater appreciation of one

Even so, couples who choose the longdistance lifestyle have a difficult route to

"Be aware it's an option that carries with it some costs," Russell said. "It's a very stressful situation - but for some people, it's able to work."

One person who has made it work is Barbara Stowe, dean of the College of Human Ecology.

Stowe's husband, Howard, is a professor of veterinary medicine at Michigan State University in East Lans-

Barbara Stowe moved to Manhattan in October 1983, and she and Howard have lived in separate households ever since. "The biggest problem is that we enjoy each other's company very much," she

Because they both have 12-month appointments at their respective universities, Stowe said she and her husband don't get to spend much time together. When they meet, her husband generally comes to Manhattan. But sometimes, Stowe said she and her husband cross paths at meetings or conferences. "But that doesn't always work," she said.

In between times, they talk on the telephone several times a week. "We pay by the hour," she said. "It's cheaper that way."

Stowe said when she moved to Kansas, she had no idea she would be at K-State for so long. But, she said, she likes it here and plans on staying.

Commuter marriages can test the old saying "distance makes the heart grow fonder," and many find it does. added that "when people get further along in their professions, it is often difficult to move. "I guess there are some things there are no solutions for," she said.

Some people think her lifestyle is crazy, Stowe said.

"But if you are both professionally committed people, then you just have to make some kind of adjustments in order to follow your professions, as well as to have a relationship," she said.

As for the old cliche, Stowe said she believes that being separated does enhance a relationship.

"I think there might be some truth in that," she said.

She and her husband have been married 26 years.

If she had to do it over again, Stowe said she would probably do the same thing, though she added the decision would be a tough one. One word of caution, however, to anyone considering a long-distance mar-

Wedding gowns require proper care, storage

LORI LINDSTROM Collegian Reporter

With proper care and storage, wedding gowns can be preserved in beautiful condition for up to 200 years. The wedding dress should always be dry cleaned, said Tony Gieber of Stickel Cleaners & Shirt Laundry, 714 N. 12th St. A spilled drink can leave sugars in the material that will cause yellow spots if the dress is not cleaned properly.

The dress is placed in a box with white tissue paper between the folds of the dress to prevent wrinkles. The dress should be looked at in a year's time to check for any yellow spots or deterioration, Gieber said.

"Don't put the dress in a plastic bag and forget about it," said Elaine Bednarz, owner of Edelaine's Weddings Plus, 421 Poyntz Ave. "The dress needs air."

Bednarz said a plastic bag will trap moisture and cause mold and mildew growth. Since leaving the dress on a hanger causes tension and stress on the shoulders, she said it is best to put the dress in a box and pack white tissue between the folds and hard creases.

"Don't put everything in the same box either," Bednarz said. The headpiece or veil may be constructed with a glue that can melt during years of storage and discolor the dress, or they may have a metal piece that can rust and stain the dress, she said.

Bednarz also cautions against using glued beadwork in a dress. The glues may be soluble to the cleaning solutions used or they too can melt during storage. She recommends using handsewn beadwork to avoid damage to the dress. Christine Irish, owner of Christine's -The Wedding Co., 1100 Moro St., said not to leave the dress just sitting in a closet or a box exposed to the environment. Irish said she sends dresses to Allied Heirlooms, located in New Orleans, for special processing that keeps dresses from yellowing or deteriorating. Irish said the process, which costs $70, is not 100 percent foolproof, but it keeps the fabric in good condition for up to 200 years. Allied Heirlooms does guarantee its process for the lifetime of the person. Allied Heirlooms will spot-treat stains before cleaning the dress and checking for missing buttons, beads or tears. Through the company's "special spray process," the dress is treated for dry rot, yellowing, insects, perspiration stains, grease marks and fungus growth, Irish said.

Greek house plans reopening next fall

The Iota chapter of Alpha Kappa Lambda fraternity will reopen its doors in fall 1987 after a year of planning and reorganization.

The national headquarters and the AKL alumni association decided to close the fraternity's house, 1919 Hunting Ave., and reorganize before the entire operation at K-State folded, said Greg Wannemuehler, professional staff member at the fraternity's national headquarters.

But the national organization didn't want to lose the K-State chapter because of K-State's rich tradition in the Greek system, he said.

Siberia, Brazil and the United States. The origin of betrothal rings being worn on the third finger of the left hand seems to come from a Roman legend that a special nerve or vein runs from that finger directly to the heart.

Another source of this custom came from a Christian church service in which the priest would touch the ring to three fingers in sucession saying, "In the name of the Father, of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," and then place the ring on the third finger touched.

During the time of George I of England, the wedding ring was removed from the third finger after the ceremony and worn on the thumb because exceptionally large rings were popular during his reign.

Now, eloping more practical than secretive

By BECKY HOWARD Staff Writer

Although not a common method of marrying, some people choose to run away secretly to join in matrimony.

Eloping generally conjures the image of a ladder leaned against an ivy-covered farmhouse on a warm moonlit night. A young man in a baggy suit climbs to his love's bedroom window. Then the two of them descend, suitcase in tow, to drive off in an awaiting car toward their destination - a minister or justice of the peace who will marry the young couple without their parent's knowledge or consent.

Modern-day eloping carries a less romantic image and more practical legitimization. Wedding costs have risen, big weddings are fashionable, and some people find the cost and hassle of a wedding too much to deal with.

Two former K-State students, Jill Hummels and Tim Carpenter, found the planning and decision-making of even a small wedding to be a problem, so they eloped

"We were planning a small wedding, but we found it was becoming more and more difficult to do because we couldn't decide who to have in the wedding party, and then there's so much commercialization as to who's supposed to pay for the wedding and all the different etiquette channels to deal with," Hummels said.

"We both dreaded the idea of a big wedding and we agreed that spending a lot of money on one was a frivolous expense,' Carpenter said.

The couple decided to elope two months ago when Hummels was planning to attend a business convention in Washington, D.C.

because there is no waiting period, no blood tests and no witnesses required, and Jill was going to be there anyway," Carpenter said. "The ceremony was performed by a magistrate of the judge, and it only took about 20 minutes.'

"When we went back to the hotel, we were a little bit worried about telling our parents. We thought about flipping a coin to see who would call first," Hummels

Both of the couple's parents took the news well, however.

"Our parents were surprised, but they were happy for us. Our families' reactions were very positive," Carpenter said.

"My dad just kept laughing," Hummels said. "My sister had gotten married earlier and had the big, traditional wedding, and she and I had joked to my dad about how he should pay us to elope to save him the hassle and expenses."

"We also sent out a bunch of letters to our friends to let them know what had happened," Carpenter said.

"Everyone I work with just thought we were sightseeing that weekend," Hummels said. "After I told them we had eloped, some of the women I work with said that if they could go back and get married again, eloping is the way they would

"My husband and I are very happy, and if I could do it over again, I wouldn't change a thing."

A Colorado couple also decided the expense of a wedding was more trouble than it was worth and eloped to Reno, Nev., a year and three months ago.

Monica and Tom Halde, Cheyenne Wells, Colo., said the expense and decision about whose hometown to get married in made them plan an elopement after checking the prices and requirements for a marriage license in Nevada.

"I called the chamber of commerce in Nevada, and they gave me a list of three different motels and three chapels," Monica said. "We had purchased our wedding rings before the wedding, so all we had to do was make the arrangements and fly out there.

"It was the first time Tom had flown, and I thought he was going to get sick on me, but we made it," she said. Monica said the entire wedding, including plane tickets, cost about $500. We got a little package deal at the wedding chapel we were married in. This package included the rental of a wedding gown, tuxedo, the minister, flowers and pictures," Monica said. "We had some of our friends flown out to be with us. We all had a really good time.

"Our families were very happy for us when they found out. The only complaint

Preparation for unthinkable is now standard

By JENNIFER LINDSEY Staff Writer

Living happily ever after isn't the norm anymore, or at least people don't expect it to be. In fact, since divorces are becoming more and more common, couples are making premarital contracts to settle divorce settlements before the wedding.

Public policy in Kansas, however, does not allow prenuptial agreements that decide distribution of assets after a divorce. This policy was made to encourage the of marriages, said long-term duration Henry Otto III, Manhattan attorney.

The only premarital contracts that can be made in Kansas are those that determine property settlements due to a death of one of the partners.

"The courts can get around this policy (prohibiting premarital divorce settlements) by making contracts that mainly address the issue of death and include something on divorce," Otto said.

All premarital agreements can be divided into three basic categories, said Tony Jurich, clinical director of marriage and family therapy at the K-State Family

The first and most common type of agreement is made when a couple simply wants to come to a legal understanding regarding income, money or property before they get married.

These type of agreements are usually made by older couples or couples entering second or third marriages, said Gary Ellis, Manhattan attorney.

Traditional prenuptial agreements are made for older couples, Otto said.

"These were made when a widow and widower wanted to spend their golden Contracts set property division in advance years together but didn't want their children to miss out on the inheritance,"

For example, an older couple made a premarital agreement on the husband's property. Both husband and wife had been married before. The wife had one child from a previous marriage and the husband had three, Jurich said.

The couple made a legal contract assuring that upon his death all the husband's property would go to his daughters.

This could also have been stated in a will, but wills can be contested," Jurich said. If no contract had been made, Jurich said, Kansas courts would have automatically given the property to the Couples also make premarital agreements on distribution of income during the marriage.

Some couples agree to share each other's income. In other cases, each partner may want to keep his own income, Jurich said. Michael Weinberg, marriage and family counselor, said he doesn't think young married couples should make contracts on what will happen in the case of divorce. "Young couples should get married with the intention of staying together and building their fortune together," he said.

The second type of agreement is similar to the first, Jurich said, but it is not legally

"The couple comes to an understanding before they get married, but it doesn't hold any weight because it isn't legalized," he

"Young couples who are in love just don't want to sit down with a cold lawyer to work out legally what will happen in case of divorce.'

Although their agreements are not legal, Jurich said he is supportive of anything that will get a couple speaking to each other about financial things so they can accept reality before getting into the mar-

Some couples just want to work out domestic problems before they get married, Jurich said. Decisions concerning housework roles, bedtime schedules, etc. fall into this category.

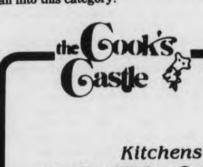

These agreements, like the second type, are based on mutual understanding, rather than legal contracts.

"The legal profession has nothing to do with this type of agreement because it (the contract) has nothing to do with any property," Jurich said.

Although premarital contracts are becoming more common, Ellis and Otto said they have not had many cases in Manhattan.

Jurich said he recommends the couple simply have premarital counseling at a center such as the Family Center for premarital counseling.

The Family Center is housed in Ellen Richards Lodge, Campus Creek Road.

From the coarse material and plain styles of the pioneer days to the sequined Taiwanese bridal gowns currently flooding the U.S. market, Americans' choices for wedding attire have varied.

But through the confusion of rising hemlines and dropping waistlines, Americans' preference for traditional wedding clothing has prevailed.

The traditional bridal attire of orange blossoms, lace veil and white satin gown has evolved from a long history of superstition and social ethics

Originally from the East, orange blossoms symbolized the wish of fertility for the bride because they appeared on trees at the same time as the ripe fruit.

Superstition and tradition are an intricate part of the wedding veil's history as Veils were used by primitive people to protect brides from used the veil to symbolize the bride's forsaking of all others and her pledge to remain faithful to her husband.

Veils have been a vital part of wedding ceremonies in China, Korea, Manchuria, Burma, Persia, Russia and Bulgaria in addition to most Western civilizations, both modern and ancient.

But America's tradition of the wedding veil can supposedly be traced back to Nellie Curtis.

Before marrying George Washington's aide — his nephew — she pinned a long white scarf in her hair because of her fiance's comments about her appearance while he had glimpsed her through a curtained window.

In addition to superstition, social pro-

Superstition inspires today's wedding attire priety played an important role in the development of the bridal gown.

Up until the Renaissance period, European brides wore red or scarlet gowns because red was thought to have the power of repelling demons. Thus, the bride's purity and innocence was preserved.

Anne of Brittany, wife of Louis of XII of France, initiated a new tradition by wearing a white satin gown free of ornamentation. Formally, white satin had been used for mourning attire.

Anne's severing of the link between white gowns and burials was not the only encounter between mourning clothes and

During the Victorian era, if a close relative of the bride died before her wedding, few wore black wedding dresses. Second marriages were never socially accepted by Victorian women. To do so would be openly recognizing that a respectable woman had slept with two men. To distinguish the pure, inno maiden from a woman returning to the altar, Victorian society restricted the white gown, veil and orange blossoms to brides entering their first marriage. While the traditional wedding ensemble evolved from social ethics, American variations more reflected the style of the period. American variations have usually reflected the style of the period.

In 18th- and 19th-century America, being "wed, bred and dead" in the same dress meant most women opted for a sturdy brown wedding dress that could be worn on dress-up occasions.

Emphasis on wedding clothes didn't end with the wedding ceremony, however. A newly married Puritan couple was expected to display their newlywed finery in

Styles of the Civil War era demanded tightly corseted ribs. Dark-colored material was standard for normal wear and wedding attire. Braids and tassels were used for decoration on the full hoop

The Victorian era covered two basic styles of wedding attire. From 1865 to 1880, skirts had a trim appearance from the front. But a side view revealed layers of bustles and short trains created through the use of pulleys, cords, pads and wires. From 1880 to 1900, wedding dresses had simpler, more natural skirt lines, blouson bodices and puffy leg-of-mutton sleeves.

In addition to Swiss cutwork, fillet crochet and English candlewicking on wedding attire, Victorian handworked embroidery included Venice lace set into the fabric in intricate patterns.

During the Jazz Age, flappers wore synthetic wedding gowns featuring the dropped waistlines, flat-chested bodices and shorter lengths popular during that era.

Postwar prosperity of the 1950s fostered the lavish styles of the bouffant hairdo and

A second reason for the style's popularity was Elizabeth Taylor in the 1950 movie "Father of the Bride." American collegiates' enthusiastic reaction to her wedding dress was similar to the craze spawned by Princess Diana's dress.

Brides of the 1980s are reverting to nostalgic styles of yesteryear with satin gowns of full skirts and trains.

Theater student lands role in upcoming soap opera

By STEVE LAWRENCE Collegian Reporter

By leaving the "Little Apple" for "Tinsel Town," Nancy Sloan, senior in theater, may be heading for stardom in Los Angeles. Sloan has been signed to play Katie Logan, a "sweet, shy, 16-year-old," in the upcoming soap opera "The Bold and the agent spotted her. "A week after the Irene Ryan competition he called me," she said. "I flew out Tuesday morning and had my audition Tuesday afternoon.'

Sloan signed a four-year contract with the show, which will replace "Capitol" on CBS-TV. Taping for the soap starts March 5 and it will begin airing March 23.

While the show's contract will mean job security and a steady income for four years, Sloan said she will miss the people at K-State.

"I've learned a lot here," she said. "But I'm not sure any university setting can prepare you completely for commercial theater - some of it you just have to learn when you get there."

Program to encourage faculty research

By SALLY NEARY Collegian Reporter

President Jon Wefald announced a new faculty development program funded by the KSU Foundation has been established to enable faculty to conduct research.

The program will award small grants to individual faculty to support faculty exchange programs with foreign universities to encourage faculty to accept summer seminars and to fund artistic materials and research equipment.

When Wefald took office in July, he applied to the Foundation for immediate help for three high-priority needs. Of the $700,000 allocated by the Foundation to support these three needs, $200,000 was set aside for the faculty development pro-

K-State currently participates with

Justus Leibig University, Giessen, West Germany, in a faculty exchange program. Examples of other agreements which have been signed and are in the planning stages include universities in Munich, France and Switzerland.

Charles Reagan, assistant to the president, said K-State has offered a number of faculty exchange agreements with foreign universitites. However, in the past, these programs haven't gotten underway because of lack of funds.

"It's important for the faculty to have access to the grants," Reagan

Grants of up to $3,000 have been set aside to assist these exchanges. With this financial support, the faculty is encouraged to participate, and faculty from other universities are encouraged to come here.

The National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities and the National Science Foundation summer seminars will also be supplemented with financial help. Previously, when faculty were chosen to attend these summer seminars, they were forfeiting a chance to teach summer school. They received a typical stipend of about $3,500 for eight weeks and $2,750 for six weeks, but the stipend was not enough to cover all the expenses.

This was a financial disincentive," Reagan said. He said by supplementing these fellowships by $1,500, the financial disincentive would be removed and more faculty would be encouraged to attend a summer seminar.

Small research grants will also be awarded to faculty for research equipment, materials for artistic production or research-related

travel. The dean of the college must write letters of recommendation in support of their faculty's application and put the applications in a priority

The deans must also indicate if the department is willing or able to contribute any college money on the project. In the final decision, newer faculty members and members in a field where opportunities for outside funding are few will be favored. The funding will have a $5,000 limit.

"We want to help as many faculty (members) as possible," Reagan said. He said the administration wanted to issue the grants to a wide variety of departments across campus in order to get the most benefits from the funding.

"The need for this program is great," Reagan said. "I think there will be an enormous response to it.'

Greek house plans reopening next fall

By KARI COMPTON Collegian Reporter

The Iota chapter of Alpha Kappa Lambda fraternity will reopen its doors in fall 1987 after a year of planning and reorganization.

The national headquarters and the AKL alumni association decided to close the fraternity's house, 1919 Hunting Ave., and reorganize before the entire operation at K-State folded, said Greg Wannemuehler, professional staff member at the fraternity's national headquarters.

But the national organization didn't want to lose the K-State chapter because of K-State's rich tradition in the Greek system, he

Dale Heise, graduate in agricultural engineering and an AKL alumni board member, said the national organization closed the house last fall due to lack of interest, funds and exposure

"It wasn't that we had a bad reputation," Heise said. "It was that we didn't have a reputation at all."

Heise said they contacted alumni about the reorganization plans and lack of funds available for the plan's completion.

"We told them we didn't have enough money," he said, "and it (the money) started coming in."

Wannemuehler said he mailed recruitment letters to freshman and sophomore men listed in the student directory as living in residence halls.

There have been three informative meetings to explain the benefits of belonging to the national organization and the local chapter. Wannemuehler said they're hoping to have about 30 pledges.

Five alumni who were AKL members last spring will return to instruct the new pledges, Wannemuehler said.

'We are being very selective with whom we allow to rejoin the fraternity (from the previous AKL house)," he said. "We want a fraternity with new members and a new reputation.'

Included in the remodeled house will be an intensive study section away from the living area to provide an atmosphere conducive for study, Wannenuehler said.

To encourage improved study habits, the chapter will emphasize study hours and quiet hours, he said. Members will be required to have a 2.2 grade point average or better.

In addition to scholastic achievement, the chapter will stress traditional values of fraternities, such as teaching proper etiquette.

'The image most people have of fraternities today is an Animial House image, and we want to get away from that," he said.

K-State's men's basketball team will look to maintain its upperdivision status in the Big Eight Conference tonight in Ahearn Field House against the Oklahoma State Cowboys. Tipoff is set for 7:35 p.m.

The Wildcats, 16-7 overall and fourth in the Big Eight at 6-4, defeated the Cowboys earlier this season in Stillwater, 88-77. Free throws were the difference in that game. K-State was 34 for 40 from the line, while Oklahoma State was only eight of 16.

'We're expecting a very tough fight from Oklahoma State," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "They're playing a lot tougher and with a lot more confidence. If we don't respond with a little more fight, we might be in trouble.'

Oklahoma State - 7-16 and tied for sixth place in the conference with Iowa State at 3-7 - comes to Manhattan after losing a one-point game Saturday to Missouri, 69-68.

Kruger said he wasn't surprised the Cowboys almost knocked off Missouri. The game was played in Stillwater, which Kruger said is a tough place to play.

Kruger said he expects Oklahoma State to alternate between man-toman and zone defenses

'They play a little bit of zone," Kruger said. "But they were most successful in Stillwater with a man defense against us.

A tough man-to-man defense enabled the Cowboys to tie the score at 50-50 in the second half of the teams' first meeting this season, but K-State was able to pull away on the strength of its free throw shooting. The 'Cats were 18 for 18 from the charity stripe in the last five minutes of the game.

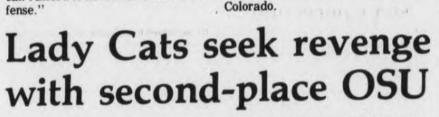

Kruger said Oklahoma State is led by guards Jay Davis and Todd Christian. Davis averages 8.6 points per game, while Christian leads the Cowboys in scoring, averaging 13.5 points per game. Against K-State this season, Davis scored 23 points and Christian scored 19.

Other probable Oklahoma State starters are Royce Jeffries (4 points per game), Ray Alford (13 points per game) and Sylvester Kincheon (10.4 points per game.)

Kruger said a victory against the Cowboys is a must for K-State in terms of conference standings.

'We've got to step out and reestablish some things - our fight and enthusiasm," Kruger said. "Those things have diminished in the last couple of ball games."

NOTES...K-State leads the series with the Cowboys 57-22...The 'Cats are still on a single season scoring average record pace. Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman was not despondent over her team's lopsided 77-57 loss Saturday to Nebraska. She just reminded her team that they have a chance to get some revenge against Oklahoma State.

"I'm really looking forward to playing Oklahoma State again," Mossman said. "We never really got into the flow of things down there. I guarantee you, we're going to get revenge on somebody."

What Mossman referred to is K-State's 75-67 loss Jan. 28 at Stillwater. Tipoff for the rematch between the two teams is 5 p.m.

tonight in Ahearn Field House. In the earlier matchup, the overpowering height of Oklahoma State proved to be the big difference as the Cowgirls outrebounded K-State 41-32 and forced the Lady Cats into early foul trouble.

K-State, 18-6, is one of the trileaders in the Big Eight Conference along with Nebraska and Missouri at 7-4. The Cowgirls sport a 15-9 record and are tied for second place in the conference race with Kansas at 6-5.

Clinette Jordan, a 6-foot-0 forward, has been Oklahoma State's scoring leader averaging 21.0 points per game. Guard Jamie Siess averages 15.9 points per contest. In the last game between the two schools, Jordan had 23 points and seven rebounds while Seiss chipped in 16 points and collected 10 boards.

The Cowgirls are coached by the lone male women's basketball coach in the conference, Dick Halterman, who has compiled a 63-49 record in his four seasons at Stillwater.

NOTES: K-State leads the series 11-4...Seniors Susan Green and Sue Leiding have been named to the District VII all-academic team. Lust corrupts.

For proof, consider the case of Lloyd Daniels, blessed with the ability to play basketball, a gift that made him a commodity.

The other part of Daniels' package is dyslexia, a reading disability that makes learning a most difficult and frustrating task. Because of that handicap, and other behavioral troubles that are probably linked to the problem, Daniels drifted through four high schools in three states over

He accumulated, one assumes almost by accident, less than 10 credits and a third-grade reading level. He obviously failed to achieve either a standard or equivalency high school diploma.

The absence of academic documentation notwithstanding. Nevada-Las Vegas arranged for Daniels' acceptance by a junior college and targeted him for enrollment at UNLV. This obviously was done for altruistic reasons, an attempt at giving the young man a second educational chance and, if he happened to decide to participate in an extracurricular activity at the university, well, they do offer intercollegiate basketball there.

Mark Warkentien, coincidentally an assistant coach at UNLV, became the young man's legal guardian. Head Coach Jerry Tarkanian candidly admitted the relationship was established to avoid breaking the rule limiting the number of visits a coach may have with a recruit. We certainly would not want any rules broken here.

And so, as planned, Daniels' junior college progress enabled him to enroll at UNLV for the spring semester, a remarkable bit of academic salvage work for a kid who, a year or so ago, was quoted as saying, "I ain't allergic to no school. I just don't want to go.'

It is not known whether Daniels had a declared major at UNLV. He did, however, seem inclined toward basketball as his extracurricular ac-Last week, the new student-athlete

He was arrested and charged with attempting to possess controlled substances after allegedly trying to buy $20 worth of crack from an undercover police officer.

Tarkanian, staunch in his antidrug stand, immediately declared that Daniels would never play for UNLV. Given his checkered secondary school record, the kid never should have been considered an intercollegiate prospect in the first place. With the current trend of demanding academic standards for college athletes, it is embarrassing to think a school would recruit a player with his scholastic credentials and get away with it.

Sure, resurrecting Daniels academically was an admirable goal, but one wonders if UNLV, or anybody else, would have been as zealous about this reclamation project if the young man were not a

First baseman Don Mattingly went after the largest salary arbitration award in the 13-year history of the procedure Monday, bidding for a $1.975 million contract from the New York Yankees, who were offering $1.7 million.

Outfielder Kevin McReynolds of the New York Mets and pitcher Danny Cox of the St. Louis Cardinals also had their arbitration hearings Monday, although with less money at stake.

Decisions on the three cases were expected either late Tuesday or Mattingly and the Yankees avoided arbitration at the last minute a year ago when they agreed on a $1.375 million contract. In a bid to settle before Monday's hearing, the team offered the slugger a two-year, $3.5 million deal which Mattingly's agent, Jim Krivacs, rejected.

Mattingly, a Gold Glove winner, batted .352 last season, second best in the American League behind Boston's Wade Boggs. He drove in 113 runs and set Yankee club records with 238 hits and 53 doubles.

McReynolds, acquired by New York from San Diego in December, was looking for an $825,000 contract after hitting .288 with 26 home runs NY's Mattingly after largest arbitration and 96 runs batted in for the Padres last year. The Mets countered at $625,000.

> Cox, 12-13 with a 2.90 earned run average for the Cardinals last year, asked for $875,000 while St. Louis came in at $600,000.

> Meanwhile, two pitchers, Cleveland's Ken Schrom and Ted Power of Cincinnati, lost their arbitration arguments, leaving management with 10 victories in the 16 cases decided so far.

Arbitrator Richard Bloch, who on Friday had awarded a record $1.85 million contract to Detroit pitcher Jack Morris, chose the figures submitted by the clubs in the cases of Power and Schrom.

Power had sought $610,000 after a 10-6 season with a 3.70 ERA in 56 games last year. He will play instead for the Reds' figure of $500,000. Schrom, who wanted $545,000 after going 14-7 with a 4.54 ERA in 34 games, was awarded the Indians' offer of $450,000.

Among other players who settled their salary disputes before arbitration hearings were pitchers Dwight Gooden of the Mets, Mike Smithson of Minnesota and Bob James of the Chicago White Sox, and infielder Pat Tabler of the Indians.

Lithographs establish 'Magical Connections'

By The Collegian Staff

"What happened to the Frogs" and "Won't Wilt, Droop or Weep" are just two of the prints by James Butler on exhibit through Feb. 20 in the Union Art Gallery.

The display titled "Retrospective Prints and Lithographs" comprises two of Butler's series that he calls "Magical Connections" and "Inside Out.

"Magical Connections" consists of five black-and-white lithographs that Butler did in July 1972 at the Tamarind Institute in Albuquerque, N.M.

"My work in 'Magical Connections' was influenced from music," Butler said. The title was taken from a song written by John Sebastien.

'Through the images, I attempted to draw relationships between music and myself," Butler said.

"It was a retrospective view of the time," Butler said. "It's 1987; my views have changed.'

Butler describes the first print in the "Magical Connections" exhibit as looking up a stairwell and through the ceiling of a cathedral.

"Inside Out" comprises four multicolor still-life and landscape lithographs done in December 1978 at Illinois State University.

The set of prints begins with the image of a vase against the wall. Butler slowly moves the focus away from the vase and concentrates on the wall.

"I start the image as a still life and end it with a landscape. I like to see the metamorphosis of how images can change," Butler said.

"The work I did then had a surrealist look. The work I do now is extending on that, but it is more specific and realistic."

Butler teaches lithography and drawing to undergraduate and graduate students at Illinois State University, Normal, where he is a professor of art.

He has written 10 publications concerning the art world and has had 112 one-man exhibitions, including one at the American Gallery in Bern, Switzerland.

In the SISCA rally case, he said he didn't know there was to be a meeting until he began receiving complaints about posters being put up on glass doors on campus.

Several students said they were in favor of a "don't photograph" policy. Beckom said in most cases, he would be willing to consent but added that there were exceptions to the rule.

"In the past, we've photographed and no one has complained," he said. "If we come up with viable information indicating there may be a problem, we may photograph.

An example he gave was a farm rally held on campus last year. Several farmers came to him and expressed concern about the safety of the event, he said.

College hires British anaesthesiologist

By SALLY NEARY Collegian Reporter

After coming from England to the United States six weeks ago, Watney, the new anaesthesiologist for the College of Veterinary Medicine, is adjusting to his new position and life in the United States.

Watney is involved in teaching, research and patient service in the Veterinary Hospital. Since K-State has never had a professional anaesthesiologist, Watney has been in great demand.

He said he goes "to whomever vells first and the loudest. It's hard being in 16 different places at once.' "We are tickled pink to have him here," said William Fortney, assistant professor of surgery and medicine.

The undergraduates, graduates, interns and faculty will grab every opportunity to work with him as often as possible, Fortney said.

Fortney said one reason the department is fortunate to have Watney is his capability in conducting research. Watney's professionalism, personality and excellent background in research will make him an "excellent team player," he said.

In the past, surgeons administered their own anaesthetics to the animals. Being responsible for both the operation and the anaesthesia is difficult, Fortney

Panel explores Lukas' writing

By JENNIFER LINDSEY Staff Writer

In a preconvocation forum Tuesday night panelists discussed "Common Ground," a Pulitzer Prizewinning book by J. Anthony Lukas that illustrates race and class problems in America that continue to this day.

Lukas will be the fourth speaker in the 1986-87 University Convocation series Thursday.

Panelist Wayne Rohrer, professor in sociology, said Lukas' book profiles the lives of three Boston families - two working class and one middle class. Each of the three families lived with social difficulty, were exposed to violence, failed to realize social opportunities and experienced some threat to vulnerabilty, Rohrer said. Lukas also compared the immobility of working-class families to

"They (working-class families) can't escape the social and working problems they are in," Rohrer said. Lukas offers no solutions to the problems of race and social class in America in his book.

the mobility of the middle class.

"Some believe there are no solutions, short of revolution," Rohrer

But panelists discussed their solutions to the race and class problem. Although "Common Ground" dealt with economics, black history and social distribution, it is really a book on how not to desegregate schools, said Juanita Rowland McGowan, program planner for Midwest Race Desegregation Assistance Center.

After 15 months of deliberaton, the judge ruled for the NAACP and said desegregation should begin in two months.

Boston's desegregation problem began with this decision, McGowan said. The judge spent 15 months working through the legality of the situation but not its social implica-

"Change is a process, not an event," she said.

By setting the desegregation to begin in two months, the desegregation in Boston was turned into an event.

McGowan said there are four phases of change - orientation and preparation, implementation, maintenance and refinement.

"Boston went right to phase two,"

As a result, the people weren't ready, and schools experienced racial problems, McGowan said. "Teachers had difficulty relating to the new students. There were curriculum problems, and black students were pounced upon for speaking black poetry and black

"If change processes are not considered, many students get lost in the process and leave the system not feeling very good about

Jane and John have many mutual friends and have been to the same parties and other gatherings during the past year. John always seemed to be a nice guy, and Jane trusted

But the first time they went out alone together, the situation was different. While driving Jane home, John took a detour on a desolate road and stopped. He tried to persuade Jane to have sexual intercourse. Finally, with physical force, John had his way.

Jane did not call the police. She thought she couldn't be raped by a friend. Besides, she was at fault, she told a friend, she probably led him

A rapist may be the victim's friend or boyfriend. But any time a woman is coerced into having sex against her will, the law considers it rape.

To alert women and men to the problem of date or acquaintance rape, the Women's Resource Center has declared Feb. 23-27 Date Rape

"Part of the problem is that women don't define it as rape," said Katherine Parker, assistant director of the Women's Resource Center. Another part of the problem is the attitude of men who think they can expect sex in return for taking a woman out, she said. A 26-minute film, "Rethinking Rape," will be shown at 3:30 p.m. every day next week in Union 207. In the film, a victim of date rape speaks about her feelings and how helpless she believed herself to be. There are also interviews with a man who almost raped a friend, a former model who has been raped and a prominent psychologist. After the film, a discussion will be led by a different person every after-

"Contrary to a widely held opinion, date rape is criminal and harmful." said Judy Davis, director of the Regional Crisis Center. "There is a general failure to understand its effects.' Davis will lead the Monday afternoon discussion.

Hayden considers cutting farmers' legal aid

From Staff and Wire Reports

A counseling and assistance program for Kansas farmers located in Waters Hall faces deep budget cuts that could force it to shut

Director Stan Ward said Monday that attention has been focused on Gov. Mike Hayden's proposal to eliminate funding for the free legal services provided by the Farmers Assistance Counseling and Training Service. However, Ward said the deletion of $160,000 for legal counseling and representation is only part of the impact of the governor's proposed budget cuts on the $614,000-a-year program under which farmers and their relatives can call a toll-free number to seek assistance. The cuts will not only affect the legal

Proposal will terminate all assistance, director says aspect but will also eliminate human needs personnel, personal counseling, and employment and retaining personnel. "If we lose those three human service positions, we will have no capability whatsoever to deal with employment retraining questions and basic family needs such as medical assistance, food, utilities and those kinds of things," Ward said. "And we will have practically no way to deal with the crisis intervention calls that have come in here - the emotional problems families are dealing

"There is no way we could begin to function up to our present capacity if these cuts were to go into effect," Williams said.

The proposed budget also fails to replace $55,000 in federal funds and about $40,000 in Kansas State University Cooperative Extension Service monies now used to pay the salaries of four FACTS workers. The federal and extension funds won't be available next fiscal year because of federal budget cuts.

"If we have to delete legal assistance, we're going to cripple our ability to help farmers keep their farms," Ward said.

The proposal for these cuts, recommended by former Gov. John Carlin's staff, is currently in the Legislature, Williams said.

Gov. Hayden supports continuation of the FACTS program and is backing legislation that would keep it from automatically passing out of existence on June 30.

'We're hoping Hayden will realize the importance of this program," Williams said.

The $160,000 for legal aid was being paid to Kansas Legal Services Inc., which provided eight lawyers specializing in farm legal problems. Since July 1985, the team has handled 560 cases, helping farmers with difficulties with lending institutions, problems with grain elevators, landlords and lawsuit defense in general.

FACTS currently has nine people on its staff. After the cuts, only one farm finance specialist, one attorney, the director and two secretaries would remain, Ward said. "I'm not certain we could answer all the phones much less make the return calls that would be necessary," he said. "We certainly couldn't provide any counseling. We might have to close down.

The Kansas Farmers Union has been critical of Hayden's proposed FACTS

"The governor has left only enough funding of the FACTS program so it may keep its doors open in name only, and not enough to provide any significant beneficial services for the hundreds of Kansas farm families still in need of the services provided by the FACTS program," said Ivan Wyatt, KFU president.

Representatives of the state's largest farm group, the Kansas Farm Bureau, plan to testify in favor of FACTS at legislative hearings, said Paul Fleener, the bureau's chief lobbyist.

Witness recalls death camp horrors

JERUSALEM — A trial witness recounted the horrors of Treblinka Tuesday and the brutal role played by "Ivan the Terrible," the death camp guard who Israel says later became Ohio autoworker John Demjanjuk.

Yitzhak Arad said Ivan and another Ukrainian-born Nazi guard named Nicolai "used to stand near the entrance (of the gas chambers), driving the Jews to their deaths under a shower of blows and beatings...using bayonets or metal bars or whatever was Demjanjuk, wearing the same brown suit he has worn at all his court appearances since his extradition to Israel one year ago, listened to Arad's testimony without showing emotion. It was the second day of his trial.

He leaned forward at times, fiddling with his earphones through which he heard a simultaneous translation from Hebrew into English. Occasionally he yawned.

Demjanuk, retired now and stripped of his U.S. citizenship, says he is not Ivan the Terrible and never was at Treblinka.

Battle continues in Beirut; 24 die

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Shiites fought an alliance of Druse and communist gunmen for the third day Tuesday in a battle for control of Moslem west Beirut that has caused scores of casualties and set whole neighborhoods ablaze.

Police said at least 24 people were killed and 125 wounded Tuesday in west Beirut's fiercest factional struggle for three years. They said the toll was at least 30 dead and 150 wounded since the fighting began

Dozens of fires raged in residential districts because the intensity of battle kept fire engines from getting through. Several apartment buildings were burned and scores of cars destroyed by gunfire and rocket-propelled grenades.

Grenade explosions and bursts of fire from heavy machine guns shook the city all day. Thousands of families took refuge in basements and bomb shelters.

Syria backs all the factions involved. In theory they are allied in the 12-year-old civil war with Lebanon's Christians, but they periodically fight each other for domination of the capital's Moslem

Vietnam dismisses 12 ministers

BANGKOK, Thailand - Vietnam said Tuesday it had dismissed 12 government ministers in what analysts saw as an effort to bring in specialists who can revive the communist nation's moribund

One of the most sweeping political housecleanings in Vietnam's history follows a tide of self-criticism and the resignations last December of three top party leaders.

The official Voice of Vietnam radio announced the purge of the Council of Ministers and said elections will be held April 19 for members of the eighth National Assembly. Among the ministers dismissed was Gen. Van Tien Dung, who planned the final 1975 offensive against South Vietnam.

More leadership changes are expected in conjunction with the elections, including choice of a new premier to replace 80-year-old Pham Van Dong, although the assembly itself has little power.

"It's a complete reworking of the apparatus," he said. "There has been a concensus to put technocrats into the government for the sake of efficiency." Dong, Communist Party chief Truong Chinh and key Politburo member Le Duc Tho quit their party posts during the sixth party congress in December but retained government positions.

LaRouche followers face charges LEESBURG, Va. - A state grand jury Tuesday indicted 16 followers of political extremist Lyndon H. LaRouche on felony securities fraud and other charges.

A state prosecutor said the charges stemmed from the sale of notes and other securities on behalf of LaRouche-related organizations and involved a portion of $30 million in allegedly fraudulent solicitations

State and city police and Loudoun County Sheriff's deputies began arresting the LaRouche followers Tuesday evening at their homes and at LaRouche's headquarters in Leesburg, about 30 miles outside

Also indicted were five LaRouche-related organizations, said Sheriff's Lt. Terry McCracken.

LaRouche himself was not charged, authorities said. McCracken said all were charged with multiple counts of securities fraud, sale of unregistered securities and selling securities as an unregistered agent.

Prosecutor William Burch said each was a felony carrying a maximum two to 10 years in prison.

Agency issues rail safety violations

WASHINGTON - Tampering with railroad safety equipment is widespread, the head of the Federal Railroad Administration said today, reporting that his agency has issued 18 citations in recent

The safety violations occurred when train operators tampered with warning and safety devices, Adminsitrator John Riley said. Riley told a Senate hearing that he believes tampering with safety devices on trains is widespread and that railroads are not doing enough to curb it. He asked that Congress give his agency new powers to act directly against railroad employees found to tamper with devices such as automatic braking equipment and automatic signal warning equip-

Since the Jan. 4 collision of an Amtrak passenger train and Conrail freight locomotive, in which 16 people were killed and 175 injured, investigators have found at least 18 incidents of railroad train operators interfering with safety equipment. Two of those incidents involved federal inspectors observing directly such tampering, Riley said.

Exemption lacks support in House

TOPEKA - The chairman of the House Taxation Committee said Tuesday Gov. Mike Hayden's proposal to exempt all social security payments from the state income tax does not now have enough support in the Legislature to pass.

"My sense is that if it were voted on today, it would not pass," said Rep. Ed Rolfs, R-Junction City, the chairman of the panel.

Rolfs made the statement after a committee hearing on a bill that would implement the plan the Republican governor outlined in his budget message to the Legislature last month.

The lawmaker's comments came after a Topeka woman, who said she would benefit from the proposal, denounced the idea as a handout

"It is my opinion that those who can pay should pay," said Ruth Wilkin, a former state representative who once was chairwoman of the tax committee. "And why would you want to give a tax break to those with the most income."

CHESTER PETERS LECTURE IN STUDENT DEVELOPMENT

Dr. McKeachie's address is titled: THE INGREDIENTS OF A GOOD UNDERGRADUATE EDUCATION

Tuesday, February 24, 3:30 p.m. Forum Hall K-State Union

The Public is Invited

Sponsored in cooperation with the KSU Foundation

Dr. McKeachie is the Associate Director of the National Center for Research to Improve Post-Secondary Teaching and Learning based at the University of Michigan. Dr. McKeachie has brought the resources of his discipline (psychology) to bear on the teaching of mathematics, music, veterinary medicine, social science, engineering, English, architecture, and general education. His more than 250 publications include psychology texts, sections in the World Book Encyclopedia, and papers on the academic chairpersonship.

Rare system to aid physicists

By TIM STALEY Collegian Reporter

K-State is in the process of elevating its status as a world leader in atomic physics.

After constructing a linear accelerator, the University will have one of only four in the United States. The accelerator will enhance the ability of members of the Department of Physics to do research on ion-atom collisions, said Tom Gray, professor of physics.

"You can liken (the ion-atom collision) to basically a surfer," Gray said. "(The accelerator) is like the crest of a wave. The particles are injected into this device, and they ride on the crest of the wave and they get

"In (atomic) physics we are probably among the premier groups in the free world," said Gray, who is the staff physicist in charge of the linear accelerator.

The James R. Macdonald Laboratory at K-State will be the only laboratory in the world to have an accelerator of this size dedicated to atomic physics.

Three other universities are building or operating a linear accelerator, Gray said, but the K-State laboratory will be the only one to use the accelerator for atomic physics. While continuing regular academic functions, including research and experimentation, the staff will focus on the production of a super-conducting linear accelerator. The department will use the linear accelerator primarily to study ion-atom collisions, its mission for the U.S. Department of Energy. The energy department has given K-State a $5.1 million grant to complete the project, which includes construction of the accelerator and construction of the cryogenic system that will run the accelerator. The cryogenic system is a process using liquified gases to cool the accelerator, allowing it to operate as it was designed - to run at very low temperatures. It allows a smaller accelerator to have higher accelerating power.

In addition to this grant, the state allocated $1.1 million for the construction of a facility to house the accelerator and cryogenic system. The addition to the laboratory was finished early this year.

"If that doesn't benefit man, I don't know what does," he said. "That's particle accelerators doing that. Those are the devices that people said once upon a time, 'We don't need those things; they are too expensive.' Now you go talk with someone who's had a hip-joint replaced and ask them if it's too expensive."

Gray said advances in physics have played a primary role in advances in other areas of scientific study. Medical technology is what it is because of advances in physics, he

"Where do you think cryogenic surgery came from? Where do you think advances in computers came from? Where do you think the Teflon skillet came from?" Gray said. "These are things we take for granted, but they came out of physics.

Physics is where we live. You cannot get away from physics. We live in a world, a universe that is dominated by the laws of physics. Not chemistry, not biology. It's physics."

Gray came to K-State 111/2 years ago on sabbatical from North Texas State University and decided to stay.

He said the laboratory is so good it is scheduled to become a national facility.

"We will be a national laboratory for ion-atom research right here on the plains of Kansas," Gray said. "That's not a well-known fact, unfortunately.

"The laboratory has an international reputation," he said, adding that they have attracted physicists from Japan, Germany, South America, Korea and Europe.

"I think it is a fantastic thing for Kansas State University and the state of Kansas," Gray said. "What we do goes far beyond the state of Kansas.

Students to re-unite with past counselors

By KIM GREER Collegian Reporter

About 350 principals and counselors from 196 Kansas high schools are scheduled to attend the 35th annual principalcounselor-student conference Thursday.

The conference serves a dual purpose, said John Flemming, assistant director of admissions. It allows high schools to get feedback on their education systems, and it allows K-State to determine its advantages and disadvantages in terms of academic programs.

In addition, people see the campus and discover what makes K-State different, such as the renovation of Weber Hall or the construction of the biochemistry building south of King Hall, Flemming said.

"We have the highest attendance of any Regents institution. Our students have been really good about going," he said, adding that the high attendance could illustrate students' concern.

Flemming said the conference, "almost a regional reunion," allows students to see others from their hometown who attend K-State.

Following registration, conference members will attend sessions on subjects as K-State's enrollment management process

These programs are geared to provide high school principals and counselors with updated information they can give collegebound students in their high schools.

Students may meet with their former principal or counselor after 10 a.m. in the Union or Ahearn Field House. A list of attending schools and their locations will be in the Collegian.

Flemming said many schools sent letters to their former students at K-State to remind them of the conference.

Using Ahearn Field House as a meeting place for some of the schools was a problem this year, Flemming said. Because of the time required to set up and clean for the conference, planners do not like to schedule the conference on days before or after home basketball games.

The University of Kansas holds its conference either the day before or after K-State's conference, he said.

The universities annually alternate conference dates between Wednesday and Thursday. This helps boost attendance of principals and counselors because "it makes it easier for (them) to justify coming (to the conferences)," he said. "We can help (KU) and they can help us.'

Blue Key opts to suspend oath

Looking back over the past year, I have no doubts that few K-Staters truly live "Purple Pride: The K-State Tradition" more than Blue Key members. At the heart of every single activity we undertake is the ideal of making K-State better through serving the University community.

We take great pride in coordinating K-State's Homecoming activities every year as well as co-sponsoring an All-University Leadership Workshop, ushering for the Landon Lecture Series and assisting with a variety of other service activities. Moreover, we also award outstanding K-State students approximately 13 $500 scholarships from the proceeds of the Blue Key Scholarship Endowment Fund. Being the largest studentorganized endowment on campus, it has reached a level of $150,000 primarily through donations, time and commitment by students and alumni of Blue Key. Clearly, our interests lie in maintaining and improving the quality of K-State in a variety of ways.

Recently, an issue has been brought to the attention of Blue Key that truly had not been apparent previously. Frankly, this issue had not even been considered as a concern to our group because it has been buried in our national constitution - an item that even Blue Keyers prefer not to spend leisure time analyzing.

Although there has never been any reason to believe that it actually exists, discrimination on the basis of religion could occur under present circumstances. The Pledge as stated in the most recent issue of the national constitution specifically contains an affirmation of a belief in God. Realizing that there are only 15 K-Staters in Blue Key each year, the likelihood of religious discrimination becoming apparent to the individual Blue Key members is minimal. This contention is certainly not intended as an excuse, but more of an explanation of how this problem could have continued for so long undetected.

Blue Key has never had any intention of discriminating among its members by requiring them to take such an oath. Although many of our members may strongly believe in God, religion is not present whatsoever in any form in our organized activities.

Because the possibility of discrimination on the basis of religion exists, the K-State Blue Key Chapter overwhelmingly voted at our most recent meeting to suspend the Pledge entirely. This action assures that religious discrimination specifically will not exist for the selection of new members and allows the K-State Blue Key members the opportunity to take the lead nationwide in pursuing permanent changes in our national Suspension of the oath is just one step in our goal of eliminating the possibility of any discrimination in our membership selections. The K-State Blue Key Chapter also mandated at our last meeting to actively seek changes in the national constitution regarding this issue of religious discrimination as well as other consistencies. A committee comprising all 15 current Blue Key members, both advisers and the University attorney will be carefully scrutinizing the national constitution and making recommendations for constitutional revision

The K-State Chapter of Blue Key certainly appreciates that these issues have been brought to our attention. We are now directly in the process of remedying these discrepancies as well as others that have become apparent from our conversations with the

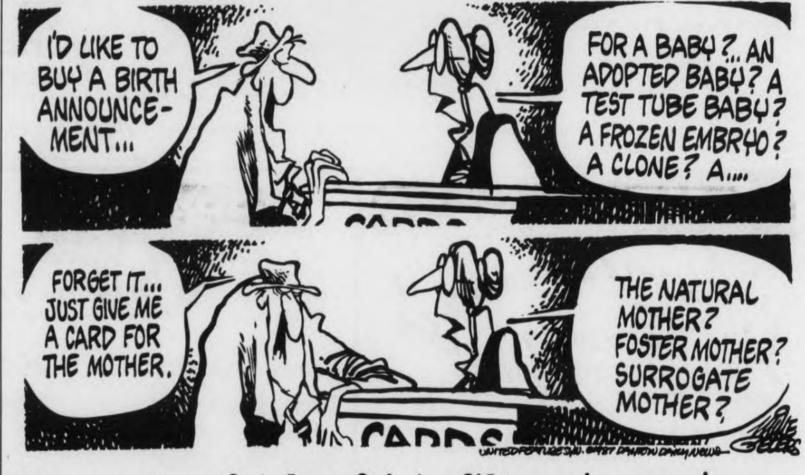

To some of you struggling through this column, this issue may not command your interest, and that is really unfortunate. Although the opinions of any individual are to be respected, even the possibility of discrimination in the context of groups that are public in nature or associated with any form of our government is intolerable.

Problems of discrimination - even though unapparent at first - do exist in various, subtle forms throughout our society. Blue Key encourages all other campus groups to review their own constitutions as well as their methodologies and requirements to be certain that such potential concerns do not Consider this to be just another service to the University community that Blue Key has experienced and wants to share with other groups. If this issue has done nothing else than to create a sense of awareness of discrimination among the campus community, then Blue Key has once again lived up to its motto: "SERVING, I LIVE." This simple statement has been accurately interpreted as "I express my own life and character in what I am able to accomplish for my fellow man." I am certain that this predominant ideal of service will continue to be perpetuated in Blue Key at K-State.

The real honor of being a Blue Key member derives from having the opportunity to serve and improve Kansas State University in so many countless ways. It is the sincere and undeniable hope of the Blue Key members that the recognition of inconsistencies and misintentions existing in our own national constitution will serve to stimulate the awareness of such problems, especially in other University activities and organizations.

Kelly Welch is Blue Key president and a senior in agricultural economics.

Stench of 'draft' infiltrating air

If you've noticed a funny smell of late, sifting slowly but persistently through the pipelines of the media, then you are not alone. But before you call the plumber to complain of broken sewer lines, make sure you know from whence those noxious fumes come. After all, a call to your Congressperson might be more in order.

The American public is starting to catch wind of a campaign to bring back a military draft. Months of growing Congressional support for a return to compulsory conscription (the draft) culminated Feb. 5, when Senator Ernest Hollings, D-S.C., introduced legislation to reinstate the draft.

Hollings and a number of other prominent Democrats, including Bill Bradley, Gary Hart and Sam Nunn, have voiced their support for the draft by echoing the essence of John Kennedy's notion of modern liberalism: "Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country." Smells like fascism to me.

Indeed, one of the arguments put forth by Timothy Noah in an editorial from the Washington Monthly is that a draft could accomplish things a voluntary army couldn't. Things like, "caring for children and the elderly, cleaning up the environment, teaching in ghetto schools and rebuilding the nation's crumbling infrastructure of roads, bridges and water and sewage systems."

If so, someone needs to clarify how a military draft will accomplish these essentially civilian services. More likely, when Noah and other neo-liberals talk of solving "a long list of serious problems that won't be solved any other way," we can look for a series of military interventions which have no support from the American public.

When government officials reassure us that there are no plans to move from draft registration to an actual draft, we should remind them that this country has never had a draft registration without later implementing a draft, and that the United States has never had a draft without a war following soon after.

In 1979, Gen. Bernard W. Rogers told members of Congress, "The draft being unpopular to so many is why I suggest the evolutionary approach. First, start to register and get us accustomed to that. Then commence to classification. Then, start to draft." Less than one year later, President Jimmy Carter reinstated draft registration. But liberals and Democrats haven't been alone in their support for a return to compulsory service - they just haven't kept as quiet about it as the Great Communicator's

Consider: -In October of 1982, the federal government conducted Operation Proud Saber, one of several operations designed to evaluate

Selective Service's induction capacity. -Although promised in 1980 they wouldn't be used, the Selective Service System began sending a modified version of the old draft card to registrants in the fall of 1983. -Eight hundred thousand copies of the Selective Service Information Booklet are currently stored in a warehouse at Fort Sheridan in Highland Park, Ill. Although this booklet will be the primary source of information in the event of a national emergency, it contains no information about medical deferments. Likewise, the form for conscientious objectors does not ask all of the questions necessary to obtain conscientious objector status.

-In July 1983, SSS Director Gen. Thomas Turnage said, "We're ready. Tomorrow we could have a random lottery and before the day would end we would be sending telegrams to the individuals that would be the first selected. And within the first 30 days we would have the first 100,000 people in the training base.

-In September 1983, Gen. David Jones, retired chairman of the Joints Chiefs of Staff, insisted, "We need greater overall capacity to project our power around the world." One month later, U.S. troops projected their power to a team of Cuban construction workers on the tiny island of Grenada.

-Other plans for U.S. military intervention in Central America have been concocted. One former Pentagon analyst estimates such a venture would require 100,000 to 150,000 bodies - about the same number to be included in the first round of

-Thus far under the Reagan administration, more than 2,500 local draft boards have been set up across the United States - most of them in secrecy.

As if in preparation for a return to the draft, the federal government has taken a number of steps to eliminate some of the more traditional ways of avoiding the draft. For instance, Canada will no longer agree to harbor draft dodgers, and the student deferment of the Vietnam era has been drastically restricted. In the event of a draft, college students could delay induction for no longer than one semester, or one academic year in the case of college seniors

Proponents of the draft have claimed this would ensure fairness to low-income people by no longer allowing middle and upper class students to escape the draft. "Conscience," Ernest Hollings explained, "tells us that we need a cross section of America in our armed

Hollings didn't explain what "conscience" had to say about the even more severe restrictions the government has placed on the hardship deferment - a measure traditionally used by low-income draftees to avoid financial, physical or psychological difficulties arising from the draft. Hollings also failed to relate what "conscience" had to say about seizing young people and forcing them to sell their services to a massive military

Like most pleas for the draft, Hollings' appeared in the context of words like 'democracy' and "a free nation" - strange words indeed, considering the secrecy and the ominous implications of a return to the

U.S. actions imply preparation for war

With the revelations of the Iranian arms scandal, the issue of U.S. intervention in Nicaragua has remained a hot topic. While support to the Contras is a major issue that deserves to be analyzed in the public forum, I feel it is being somewhat trivialized by this scandal. The question to be considered shouldn't be what President Reagan knew about the illegal activities undertaken by certain people in his basement, but rather what in the hell are we doing in Central America?

The Reagan administration is now in the process of trying to secure even more funding for the Contra rebels fighting against the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. Many officials, such as Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams, are urging members of Congress to consider aid to the Contras based on its own merits and not in the light of the Iranian arms scandal.

For the first time in many years, I tend to agree with a member of the Reagan cabinet.

George Shultz

CARAWAY Collegian Columnist

Let Congress look beyond the political wrangling and see the situation for what it is: a terrorist operation against the elected government of another nation.

The mission of the Contras, or at least that which has been made public, has changed over the years. When the Contras were created, they were sold to the American public as a force trying to stop the alleged flow of arms from Nicaragua to the leftist rebels in El Salvador. But after years of trying to substantiate these claims, the total lack of evidence of any arms shipments to Salvadoran rebels forced the administration to change the Contra's public image.

For the last few years, the public mission of the Contras had actually split into two parts. First, there is the mission to overthrow the Sandinista government, a view held by more extremist people, such as White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan.Second, there is the view held by the more moderate elements that the Contras can pressure the Sandinistas into a political settlement.

These two views seem to have come about more out of necessity than policy design. Military strategists soon became painfully aware the Contra's didn't have a chance of overthrowing the Sandinista government. So the image changed more toward the moderate view, although a few of the hardliners stood their ground.

Even with this shift, the Contras stand little chance of forcing the Sandinistas into a settlement. The Nicaraguan people view the Contras as the same people they overthrew in the 1979 revolution. And, to a greater extent, their views are true. Many of the Contra officers were members of Anastasio Samoza's National Guard, particularly known for its brutality. Given this, the Nicaraguan people are not about to sign away the revolution costing them 50,000 lives.

But there may be more to the Contra's mission than is made public. As stated by ex-CIA agent John Stockwell, their mission is "to soften up Nicaragua for an American invasion." This sounds absurd, right? But this idea is not really that far out. Even Secretary of State George Shultz, considered an administration moderate, would not rule out the use of American troops in Nicaragua in a recent interview on "Meet the Press."

Since the Vietnam war, many people believe it to be politically impossible for America to invade another country. Try telling that to the people of Grenada. Ronald Reagan proved to us if the country is small enough, close enough and threatening enough, the United States would have no trouble taking it over. Not only did Reagan gain an island in the Caribbean, he also gained a few points in the public opinion polls.

The real trick to carrying out politically feasible operations is to stay as far away from the "Vietnam Syndrome" as possible. You have to make your wars short, sweet and close to home. This is what a war in Nicaragua would be. Nicaragua is in this hemisphere, "a two-day drive from Arlington, Texas," as President Reagan once pointed out.

It is also a fairly easy military target. It can be easily blockaded because the United States controls all of its borders and ocean traffic. It could literally be shut off from the rest of the world. There would be no Ho Chi

HOW MUCH DO I KNOW ABOUT OUR LATIN AMERICA POLICY, AND WHEN DID I KNOW

Minh Trail to re-supply the Sandinistas as there was in Vietnam. Also, Nicaragua has only 3 million people, while Vietnam has over 50 million.

Given these circumstances, the United States could easily invade Nicaragua and take over the country rather quickly. The one thing that stands in the way, besides the Nicaraguan people, is the lack of the right provocation, a "trigger." Or, as Reagan prefers to call it, a "smoking gun," similar to the one provided by Libya's Moammar Khadafy shortly before the United States bombed Libya's shores.

These other factors only count for justifying the operation after the fact. But something must happen beforehand to start the wheels in motion. And the Reagan administration has actively begun in its attempts to create the trigger which will draw this country into a war in Central America.

Expert deciphers handwriting samples

By SHELLY SHAFFER Collegian Reporter

People send out hidden messages every day. Miriam B. Field, a certified graphoanalyst in Manhattan, deciphers them.

Graphoanalysis is the scientific study of strokes in handwriting that reveal personality and character

'We're all made up of habits and traits. The characteristics of those determine our behavior," Field said. "These traits which are revealed in handwriting can be assessed and measured through graphoanalysis."

She said the strokes used in handwriting can reveal traits such as: emotional responsiveness and depth; imagination; goal setting; methods of achievement; fears; defenses; integrity factors; social traits; and vocational aptitudes.

A certified graphoanalyst for 17 three reasons: desire for counseling years, Field has a master's degree in graphoanalysis from the International Graphoanalysis Society in Chicago and is a member of the organization. Based on ethics and scholastic achievement, membership to the society is by invitation on-

Graphoanalysis is a highly respected psychological test that is accurate more than 90 percent of the time, she said.

Field said she has been consulted by individuals for personal analysis, by lawyers to use in court testimony and by interviewers to analyze prospective employees.

Field said others come to her for compatible with a particular job.

She said those wanting personal analysis generally come for one of vocational counseling because they want to know if their traits will be in a certain area of their life; curiosity about the process; or to test Field's ability and accuracy.

For a general analysis, at least 11/2 written pages of material is necessary. Field said the sample is better if it is written at two separate times. A spontaneous writing, such as a letter, is better than copying something from a book.

'It's not the letters but the strokes that I analyze," Field said. "I can analyze without reading the material. The same goes with a foreign language.'

Field said she prefers to call graphoanalysis "brain writing," rather than "handwriting analysis." For example, people with disabilities can be tested, because the traits are the same whether the instrument is held by the hand, mouth or foot. In other instances, the slant of strokes in writing determines a person's emotional responsiveness or lack of it, Field said.

'Left-handed people have been highly discriminated against," she said. "In some cases, strong attempts are made to change them to write with their hand...Teachers and parents have done this because they realize the world is geared toward right-handed

For some, the experience may be highly traumatic, and this can be seen in their handwriting, Field said. Field said she believes teachers should be exposed to graphoanalysis. "Teachers are highly trained in handling problems of students. However, the size of classes prevents them from spending adequate time to work with each student," she said

Field will teach a University For Man class on graphoanalysis.

City to help fund letters from K-State

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Collegian Reporter

In an attempt to raise enrollment, the mayor and City Commission may be sending welcome letters to prospective K-State students.

City commissioners approved a request at Tuesday night's meeting from Pat Bosco, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, to send letters to students who have applied for admittance to K-State.

Studies show that of the total number of students who apply for admittance to K-State each year, only about 33 percent actually end up attending the University, said Mayor Rick Mann.

The cost of mailing about 7,000 letters to prospective students would be $875, Mann said. Bosco said K-State would do the work if the Manhattan

Ioint effort may increase enrollment

Chamber of Commerce would supply the letters, envelopes and postage.

"It's really a joint effort to increase the number of students who would attend the University," Mann said. "I think it would be a good step for us to try and increase the enrollment." Commissioner Gene Klingler said he thought something needed to be

"My daughter just graduated from Kansas State University, and in the three years that she was here, not once did we get a piece of mail regarding her and her attendance at Kansas State," he said.

The city should send letters to students' parents as well, Klingler

"One enrollment will take care of the postage cost," he said.

Another promotional project commissioners discussed was a brick purchase program for the new Manhattan Town Center Plaza. Under the program, individuals will be able to buy personalized bricks to be laid on the plaza walkway.

Suggested guidelines were that individuals only be allowed to purchase one brick and bricks not be engraved with names of businesses. Because the plaza area is to be a 'people area," Mann said the brick program was "in tune with what we're trying to do. I think it is a good idea. It makes our project unique.'

"It strikes me as different," Klingler said. "My feelings are that it's somewhere between neat and Commissioners voted to set a price of $20 per brick. Klingler suggested a family purchase plan, but the idea was rejected.

In other discussion, Suzanne Lindamood said she was concerned that no city ordinance exists limiting the number of dogs individuals may have on their property.

"As I read it now, you can have 50 dogs in your backyard," she said.

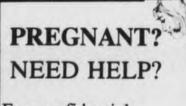

Commissioners decided to look into the problem, which Lindamood said constituted a health hazard and possible nuisance.

Apples 'a peel' to health, provide fruitful nutrition

By KRISTI BARANCIK Collegian Reporter

No matter how you slice 'em, apples are a nutritional bargain. Whether they are baked, boiled, sauced, juiced, or picked fresh off the tree, apples are a great tasting part of a healthy diet.

An average-sized apple, approximately 2 3/4 inches in diameter, is composed of 84 percent water. It has about 61 calories which are derived from the natural sugars that give apples their sweet taste.

"Apples are relatively low in fat. and most of the caloric value comes from the carbohydrate," said Karen Penner, food science extension specialist and associate professor of foods and nutrition.

Apples contain essentially no protein or fat, but the average apple contains 15.3 grams of carbohydrate.

Apples also provide an excellent source of dietary fiber. Fiber is the portion of the cell wall of a plant that is undigestable or resistant to human digestive enzymes. It contains no calories, vitamins or minerals.

Fiber helps keep the digestive system working by creating bulk. It also absorbs water which creates additional bulk.

will contain fiber. Any of them also contain a substantial amount of water which is important," Penner

The fiber found in fruit is water soluble. This type of fiber lowers blood cholesterol levels and stabilizes blood sugar levels.

Apples come with green, yellow or red skin and can be eaten with the skin on or peeled off.

"It's more beneficial to consume (an apple) with the peel on," Penner said. Some of the fiber is lost when the peel is removed.

A healthy fiber intake goal for humans is 25 to 30 grams a day. A large apple provides about 5 grams of fiber, making it a relatively high source. The same amount of fiber is found in two slices of whole wheat bread, one cup of whole grain cereal, one-third cup of dried beans, or one cup of vegetables.

While apples contain only trace amounts of most nutrients, they are a good source of potassium and vitamin C.

Vitamin C helps bind cells together, strengthens blood vessel walls and keeps gums healthy. It also helps resistance to infection such as common colds and promotes healing.

"Most of the fruits and vegetables Vitamin C helps fight stress and prevent Alzheimer's disease. It is useful in treating glaucoma, hyperactivity and schizophrenia.

Potassium helps regulate fluid balance and is needed for nerve and muscle function and metabolism. It also helps prevent high blood pressure and strokes.

A large apple also has about 80 calories and almost 10 percent of the U.S. recommended daily allowance of vitamin C.

Dried apples provide the same nutritional benefits, but at more concentrated levels. They still serve as a good source of fiber, but they are also much higher in calories.

"The main benefits (of apples) are water and carbohydrates," Penner said. Apples also "add color and textural variation. They are easy and portable. They are popular brown-bag items, and kids like them," she Apples are also crunchy so they don't leave a lot of food particles between teeth, Penner said.

Apple diversity presents buyer with many options

By DANA BRADLEY Collegian Reporter

If one were to bring an apple a day, every day to his or her teacher starting in kindergarten and continuing to the end of their senior year in college, the number would add up to less than the variety of apples that exist. Of the more than 8,000 varieties of apples in existence, 30 have commercial use, and 22 are commonly used for eating or cooking.

Buyers can classify apples in several ways for purchase: by maturity, size, grade, and use. Apples are known as summer, fall, and winter varieties according to the time they are best for quality use.

Properly matured apples possess a rich, fruity aroma. Maturity is often indicated by brown seeds, development of a bluish color on red, and a softened texture. Immature and overripe apples lack flavor.

When purchasing apples, buyers should look for different sizes and colors according to desired use.

Buyers should also watch for defects such as decay, internal browning, scab, bitter pits, freezing injury, broken skins and bruises.

Apples are also subject to defects such as sunburn, spray burn, limb cracks, insect or mechanical in-

Apples are marketed year-round with different varieties having different uses and tastes. Summer apples, usually juicy, crisp and sweet, come onto the market in midsummer and last until early fall. Fall and winter apples tend to keep their quality better, with winter apples being available until late spring.

For those who like to indulge in the art of baking, there are 17 varieties of apples with which to create.

Those marketed in July and August are Yellow Transparent, Duchess and Wealthy. Marketed in September are Cortland, Grimes Golden, Jonathan and Winter

October's market consists of McIntosh and Rhode Island Greening.

November and December have the largest marketing group which is made up of Arkansas Black, Baldwin, Ben Davis, Northern Spy, Roman Beauty, Wagoner, Yellow Newtown and Stayman Winesap.

Seventeen varieties of apples are good for both eating and cooking.

August and September have a market containing Wealthy, Cor-tland, Grimes Golden, Jonathan and rubs, hail and drought spots, scars, winter Banana. Three kinds of apples - McIntosh, Rhode Island Greening and York Imperial - are marketed in October.

Seven kinds of apples are marketed in November and December for eating and cooking. These consist of Arkansas Black, Baldwin, Northern Spy, Roman Beauty, Wagoner, Yellow Newtown and Winesap.

For those who like to partake of apples as raw snacks, 15 varieties can be eaten alone.

In July and August, Gravenstein and Wealthy apples are available for brown-baggers.

Five kinds of apples are marketed in September. These are Cortland, Delicious, Grimes Golden, Jonathan and Winter Banana.

An October market produces three kinds of apples: Golden Delicious, McIntosh and York Imperial.

November and December market five kinds which consist of Arkansas Black, Baldwin, Yellow Newtown and York Imperial.

January through March is an overlapping period where most marketing seasons either continue through the winter or end.

Gates criticizes CIA in Senate testimony

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Robert M. Gates, the professional intelligence officer nominated to run the CIA, testified Tuesday he would consider resigning if ordered by the White House to conceal a covert operation from Congress for more than a few days.

Gates also told the Senate Intelligence Committee that CIA involvement in the secret plan to sell arms to Iran's revolutionary government was "a unique activity that we are all determined not to repeat."

But Gates said he would have been irresponsible had he relied on what he said was the "flimsy" information available to him early last October to inform Congress about the possible diversion of Iranian arms-sales profits to Nicaragua's Contra rebels.

Gates, a 43-year-old career CIA analyst, was nominated this month to replace William J. Casey, who retired at 73 after surgery for a cancerous brain tumor.

The nominee, who would become the youngest person and the third career professional ever to head the CIA, repeatedly promised to revive a relationship of candor and trust with the congressional committees that oversee the CIA's secret work

Gates testified that while the CIA had been under presidential orders not to tell Congress about the secret contacts with Iran, the agency was not blameless. For example, he said CIA agents violated "our own internal regulations" to arrange a November 1985 flight that brought a cargo of U.S. weapons to Iran.

"We did not communicate well enough internally about what was going on," he said. "We should have protested more vigorously our involvement in an operation where there were significant elements unknown to us and where we mistrusted key figures.

"We tolerated ground rules suggested by others that excluded our own experts," Gates said. "I also believe the CIA made an error in not pressing to reverse the directive to withhold prior notification (of Congress) once the operation began to string out in February 1986. The entire undertaking was a unique activity that we are all determined not to

Under questioning by Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, 'D-Texas, Gates said there had been a basic misunderstanding between lawmakers and the executive branch over legislation requiring 'timely notification' of the opening of a covert operation.

Gates said it was clear that members of Congress interpreted that as meaning notification within several days at the most.

But he said the White House never conceded that point. And the Iran arms sale operation went on for at least 10 months before becoming public.

"I believe the long period of withholding went beyond the bonds of the compromise," Gates

People who are afraid to donate blood may want to re-examine their reasons for not donating after they find out how simple - and how important - giving the gift of life really

"Ninety percent of the population needs blood or a blood product by the age of 72," said Judy Lonneke, director of donor resources development at the American Red Cross Blood Services in the Wichita region.

The Red Cross bloodmobile will be on campus Feb. 24-27. Recruitment for blood donors and volunteer workers is taking place from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. this week on the first floor of the Union.

Most people are surprised to learn how simple and painless the donating process really is, Lonneke said. "If you think it hurts, you might just pinch the inside of your arm, because that's how it feels," she

Another fear about donating blood is the rising concern about contracting AIDS, however, a volunteer cannot get AIDS by donating blood.

"There is no risk of contracting AIDS from donating blood," Lonneke said. "There is a national concern about whether people would want to receive blood in the hospital."

However, she said, she would rather have a blood transfusion in which there is a very slight risk of contracting AIDS rather than no transfusion at all.

The Red Cross has implemented several precautionary measures to avoid accepting blood that is contaminated with the AIDS virus.

The first step is screening the blood through a Human T-Cell Lymphotropic Virus Type III test, a test done on all blood donations. If the test results are positive at the Wichita lab, they are tested again to double check the results. Any blood which is suspect of containing the virus is destroyed.

A second measure to ensure safety is a self-exclusion questionnaire, which tells donors the high-risk categories for AIDS in case they are unsure about donating blood.

Paid for by students to elect Bradley asked to mark either "Yes, I believe my blood is safe for transfusion," or 'No, I do not believe my blood is safe for transfusion," Lonneke said.

This way, if donors believe they were pressured by peers or friends into giving blood, but do not feel safe about donating, their anonymous response allows the Red Cross to destroy any donations about which there are doubts.

As a final precaution, the Red Cross distributes call-back cards that state, "If for any reason you decide your blood is not safe for transfusion, please call us."

Charlene Nichols, junior in journalism and mass communications, is the student co-chairwoman of the K-State Bloodmobile. Nichols is a member of Circle K, an on-campus service organization. Circle K has been sponsoring the bloodmobile at K-State since 1964

"We work mostly on publicity and recruitment of volunteers and donors," Nichols said. Circle K's blood donation goal is 1,400 donors. Usually, fall donations total about

"I'm shooting for that goal this spring. I'll be disappointed if we don't make it," Nichols said. The K-State bloodmobile is the largest drive in the state. The University of Kansas "has about onehalf (the participation) we have," Nichols said.

Volunteers can plan on spending one hour or more helping in the canteen, as a donor escort, taking temperatures or helping wherever they are needed.

"The actual process of donating takes less than 10 minutes," Lonneke said. "You are there for about an hour because we want to take care of

Senate to vote on 5 bills

Election date to draw debate

By MICHAEL MORRIS Collegian Reporter

A motion to change the election date is one of five proposed Student Governing Association constitutional and bylaw revisions facing a vote by Student Senate tonight.

The revision would move the election date for the offices of student body president, student senators and Board of Student Publications members to three full weeks before Thanksgiving break.

The revision states the change is necessary to provide sufficient time for the Senate chairman to select the executive committee before the end of the semester.

Sally Traeger, senior in marketing and Senate chairwoman, is sponsoring a constitutional revision allowing a Senate chairman to be eligible for reelection after serving one term.

Traeger said the revision is in response to the passage of last week's bill allowing a student body president to be eligible for reelection. She said the two offices are parallel in responsibility, and the same experience for both offices would be beneficial to the efficiency of the office.

Traeger said she is also sponsoring a revision establishing an SGA treasurer position because no one person represents SGA during the allocation process.

In the past, the student body president, the Senate chairman and the coordinator of student activities have assumed the responsibility of representing SGA during the allocation process.

Another revision seeking passage is a limitation on the amount of time a referendum petition can circulate to 60 days.

Howard Woodbury, junior in animal sciences and industry, said since there is no limitation on the amount of time a petition can circulate, the petition would have no validity after 60 days.

Senate will also vote on the approval of the Human Ecology Council constitution and bylaw revi-

In other action, Senate will hear the first reading of two bills. The first will increase the student fees for the Union and Student Publications Inc.

The proposed increase is in reaction to the two organizations operating at deficit during the 1985-86 fiscal year. In addition, these organizations are projected to do so again in the 1986-87 fiscal

The Union's proposed fee increase would be $5 for full-time students and $2.50 for part-time students.

Student Publications would receive a $1.80 increase for fulltime students and $1.40 for parttime students.

The other bill proposal would restructure the student activity fee and create three separate fees for the Union. Student Publications and Recreational Services.

The proposal states the restructuring and separation are necessary because the three organizations' budgets are large and complex and warrant special consideration. In addition, the separation from the student activity fee will facilitate a more thorough review by SGA.

The bill would also allow review of the fees once every three years on a rotating basis. If the bill passes, restructuring would take effect at the beginning of the 1987 fall semester.

Both bills are being sponsored by the Student Affairs and Social Services Standing Committee.

Senate meets at 7 p.m. every Thursday in the Union.

Company to perform mystery play at noon

By The Collegian Staff

A group of farm women in rural Nebraska discover motives for murder as police officials stumble for evidence.

This is the plot of the one-act play opening the Lunch Bag Theatre Series at 11:30 a.m. Thursday in The Purple Masque Theatre.

"Trifles" is the first of nine one-act plays presented by student directors and actors throughout the semester. The play "Trifles" is a murder mystery written in 1917 by Susan

Glaspell. "It is an early example of a psychological play," said Lew Shelton, associate professor of theater and director of theater pro-

The play is very popular, but this is the first time it has been done at K-State in the 11 years of the Lunch Bag Series, Shelton said.

Most of the students involved in the performances are theater majors who receive credit for their work. They are enrolled in an independent workshop supervised by Shelton.

"This allows the students to get practical experience and to learn how to communicate with each other. This is especially important for directors," Shelton said. Student director of "Trifles" is Julia Anderson, graduate student in theater, and actors enrolled in the workshop are Penny Cullers, senior in theater, and Raina Granger, junior in theater. "People are encouraged to bring their lunch," Shelton said in reference to the time of the produc-

The plays in the series tend to be experimental character plays rather than plays of action, Shelton said. They last from 15 to 55 minutes.

The second Lunch Bag Series play, 'Window Dressing," directed by Susanne Leipold, graduate student in theater, will be performed Feb. 26. 'Saxophone Music' and "Stella" will be performed the two Thursdays before spring break.

Booster flaw still in question despite planned shuttle runs

By The Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston - Exactly one year before shuttle flights are scheduled to resume, experts continue to question the way NASA is correcting the rocket flaw that caused the Challenger disaster.

The new booster design and its testing have come under attack from Congress, from industry experts and from astronauts whose lives will depend upon the solid-fueled rocket

NASA officials and engineers from Morton Thiokol Inc., manufacturer of the rocket, say they remain confident the new design will pass critical firing tests scheduled to begin this summer.

Challenger exploded 73 seconds after launch on Jan. 28, 1986, killing its seven-member crew. A presidential commission that investigated said the accident was caused by a solid rocket booster joint that leaked, allowing superheated flame to ignite a rocket fuel tank.

The three remaining shuttles have been grounded while engineers redesign the rocket joint and conduct tests. Flights are scheduled to tually tigh resume on Feb. 18, 1988, although many observers expect that date to Investigators believe three factors caused the rocket joint to fail: a flawed design that allowed the joint to move slightly at ignition, compromising the seal formed by two rubberized O-rings; frigid temperatures on the morning of launch that made the O-rings stiff; and a series of wind shears that buffeted the rising spacecraft, perhaps causing the joint to open still further.

Engineers have settled on a new design they believe will create a more positive seal for the three joints in the solid rockets. This new design includes a metal lip that will limit joint movement and adds a third O-ring in each joint.

Additionally, the engineers are experimenting with the use of a silicon material in the O-rings to give them more resilience in cold. If the material proves inadequate, heaters will be added to the joint.

The new joint also includes insulation that is interleafed in such a way that pressure from the rocket will ac-

But to date these elements remain largely untested.

Thiokol has made three firings of partial rocket engines that included two field joints, but these tests used the design that failed on Challenger. The experiments were used to gather data and test the new insulation arrangement.

Partial rocket tests of the new joint design will not be conducted until June, according to Thiokol spokesman Gil Moore, followed by a full-scale test later in the summer.

K-State fights way to 81-60 victory

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

K-State men's basketball coach Lon Kruger got just what he wanted in Tuesday's 81-60 Wildcat victory over the Oklahoma State Cowboys in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats, 17-7 overall and 7-4 in the Big Eight Conference, turned in a poor effort in the 78-76 loss Saturday to Nebraska, after which Kruger said they needed to reestablish some things - namely fight and intensity.

"They (K-State's players) were awfully down after that game (against Nebraska),' Kruger said. "They knew they had been outfought. Our ballclub has taken a lot of pride in out-battling people and playing with inten-

"It was real important that we reestablish those qualities, and, certainly, I think we did.

The 'Cats did exhibit the kind of hustle and aggressiveness K-State fans have come to expect, outrebounding the Cowboys 40-31 and garnering 13 steals.

Kruger said his team "plays like they practice," and guard Steve Henson said the two practices before Tuesday's game were just what K-State needed.

'Our ballclub has taken a lot of pride in out-battling people and playing with intensity.'

- K-State Coach Lon Kruger

"We had probably the two most intense practices we've had in a long time," Henson said. "Sunday, we played defense the whole practice, and it was very intense, very aggressive. That's what we needed to do. If we start off dictating on defense, that will carry over to our offense.

Kruger said K-State's aggressive defense affected its offense in the early part of the game. The 'Cats did not score a field goal until the 14:02 mark of the first half.

'We'd been talking about playing harder, and whenever that's the case, you often suffer a little bit in the shooting department," Kruger said. "Certainly we did. We got a terrible start.'

K-State took a 1-0 lead at the start of the game, and did not lead again until a steal by Charles Bledsoe was converted into a layup by Mitch Richmond with nine minutes left in the half.

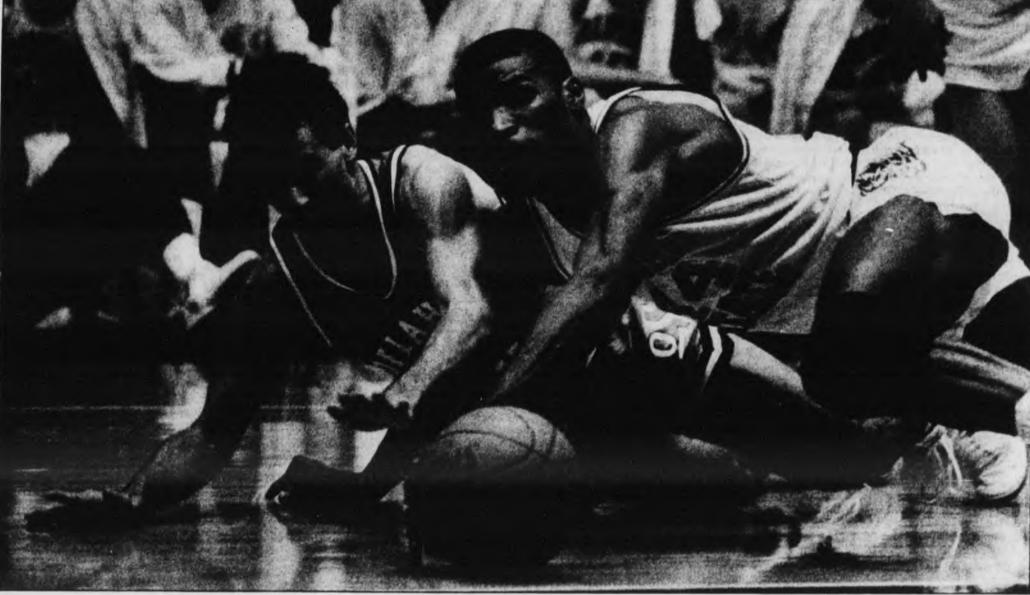

The 'Cats were leading 26-18 when Henson and the Cowboys' Ray Alford were ejected with 4:59 left in the half for unsportsman-like conduct. Their pushing match resulted in a bench-clearing scuffle, which K-State for ward Mitch Richmond said "pepped us up."

Richmond and the rest of the 'Cats appeared to be on a mission for the rest of the period, outscoring the Cowboys 11-2 and taking a 37-20 halftime lead.

The second half was no different from the first in the level of intensity exhibited by the 'Cats, as all of K-State's players saw action in the game. Only two Cowboy players scored in double figures - Sylvester Kincheon scored 10 points, while Jason Manuel netted 13.

Oklahoma State's leading scorer, Todd Christian — a Newton product who averages 14.2 points per game - was held to nine points. The Cowboys dropped to 7-17 and 3-8. Norris Coleman, who led the 'Cats with 22 points and 11 rebounds, said Kruger met earlier with him, Richmond and Bledsoe. 'We took what he (Kruger) had to say out onto the court," Coleman said. He said Kruger wanted more leadership and better positive attitudes from the trio.

Oklahoma State University guard Todd Christian and K-State forward Norris Coleman scramble for control of a loose ball during the first half of the Big Eight Conference game Tuesday in Ahearn Field House. K-State won the contest, 81-60, with Coleman leading the Wildcats in scoring with 22 points.

Richmond scored 20 points and was 10 for 11 from the free-throw line, while Bledsoe grabbed 10 rebounds and finished with six With the Kansas Jayhawks' 85-76 loss to Iowa State, the 'Cats are back into the Big Eight Conference championship race. K-State travels to Lawrence Thursday to take on the Jayhawks.

"It's an awfully important ball game," Kruger said. "It's a big challenge."

"I'm gonna go in there and say to myself 'I won't be denied," Coleman said. "We're going down there to play our type of game and try to dictate what they're trying to do."

'Significant' brawl sparks Cats to win

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

Oklahoma State coach Leonard Hamilton said after Tuesday night's 81-60 loss to K-State that the turning point was a bench-clearing brawl with 4:59 left in the

The fight resulted in Cowboys' forward Ray Alford and Wildcats' guard Steve Henson being ejected from the game.

"I think it was of tremendous significance. In fact, I think it was the turning point in the game," Hamilton said. "Ray was very important and after we lost him we couldn't replace the things that he does for us as well as Kansas State can replace Henson.

The fight ensued after Ron Meyer hit two free throws after an Oklahoma State foul with 4:59 left in the half. The Cowboys' inbounds pass ended up in the hands of Alford, who drove downcourt under heavy pressure from Henson.

With elbows flying and no place to go, Alford lost his temper and threw a punch to Henson's left eye. Henson responded, showing no sign of holding back until Oklahoma State's Jay Davis tried to restrain him.

Davis was promptly shaken off into the Ahearn Field House crowd and it wasn't long until both benches cleared and the teams became part of the action.

It wasn't apparent who was to blame for the incident. Henson said in his opinion Alford was at fault.

"In my opinion he (started the fight)," Henson said. "I was denying him the ball to Bob (Smith), so he tried to go in the back door...and threw a cheap elbow and I

Inquiries deserve answers unless question is 'trivial'

Someone once said every question deserves an answer. These are some questions that have been presented to the Collegian sports desk that might be of some interest to our readers. And, it is hoped, we have included some satisfactory answers.

Q. Why doesn't the Collegian run a calendar of upcoming athletic events?

A: Basically, it's an issue of space. In most issues, sports is limited to one page and includes a mixture of local and national news that should interest our readers. A sports calendar, which was contemplated last semester, would simply take up too much space.

Also, if there was a sports calendar, it would be too simple to become impersonal with our non-revenue or club sports coverage. It would be too easy to disregard a lengthy preview on an upcoming event by using the excuse: "It's on the calendar.'

O. Why doesn't the Collegian include more Big Eight Conference and K-State individual statistics?

A. Once again, it's a matter of sacrificing both national and local copy for statistics that can be found in publications with more space provided for sports. Of course, if our readers each wish to contribute heavily to the Collegian's advertising budget, then I'm sure the editor will gladly allow the sports department more room to grant your wishes.

Q. Is the cheetah the fastest animal on earth?

A. No answer, this isn't "Trivial Pursuit." Next question. Doesn't it seem like the men's basketball team receives more coverage and bigger photographs than the women's

TOM MORRIS Sports Editor

A. Yes and no. Yes, the men's team usually has a bigger photograph because its stories are run on a wider format due to the box score width. Because of this wider format, the photographs either can run huge or extremely small. We tend to use the larger photo. After all, a picture is worth a 1,000 words.

As for the women receiving less coverage, no, we don't believe so. Considering the amount of space alloted to women's athletics by other publications, we believe the Collegian sports writers have given the Lady Cats equitable

Q. Why do sportswriters like to write on athletes getting in trouble and subjects like that?

A. It often isn't a matter of like, but a necessity. If anything, sports reporters are often accused of not acting like journalists, but more like advocates for teams

Lady Cats stumble to 12-point win

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

K-State women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman was not overly pleased with the effort her squad put forth last night in Ahearn Field House

Fortunately for the Lady Cats, they escaped with a 74-62 win over the Oklahoma State Cowgirls and retained at least a tie in the Big Eight Conference standings.

"Obviously this was not one of our better ball games," Mossman said. "I felt as a team we did not play very smart.

Mossman referred to the Lady Cats' inability to take care of the ball and lack of killer instinct when they had a chance to put the Cowgirls away early in the game.

Oklahoma State guard Alisa Duncan and K-State center Sue Leiding fight for a loose ball during the Lady Cats' 74-62 win over the Cowgirls Tuesday in Ahearn Field House.

'With four seniors starting, you would think that we wouldn't have as many mistakes as we did and that we would play with more intelligence," said Mossman of K-State, 19-6 overall and 8-4 in the con-

The contest started a little on the sloppy side as both teams had trouble hanging onto the ball. K-State built an early 20-9 lead, but as in the first meeting between the two teams this year, in which OSU won 75-67, the Cowgirls made a run at the Lady Cats. Oklahoma State, 15-10 and 6-6, went on a 13-4 run to pull within 24-22 with 3:36 remaining in the half. The Lady Cats answered back by scoring the final eight points of the half to lead 32-22 at the intermission "I was glad that we were up by the 10 points that we were, but I felt that we had several chances to really blow the game open in the first half, and we just kept letting them come back," Mossman said.

The Lady Cats managed to maintain a 12-point lead for the first 10 minutes of the second period. But the Cowgirls, using a fullcourt trapping press, climbed back into contention when Clinette Jordan converted a three-point play to pull OSU within six with 8:59 remaining

K-State fought off the Cowgirls and built the lead back to 11 points. Tracey Bleczinski sparked K-State with a three-point play of her own to post the Lady Cats to a 56-45 lead.

Oklahoma State was not done, however, as it made one last run at the Lady Cats. Jordan hit a free throw after K-State's Carlisa Thomas was whistled for a technical foul, and Alisa Duncan then connected on a 15-footer from the wing to pull the Cowgirls to within six, 58-52, with 6:19 left in the game. K-State led by nine, 69-60, with 1:05 to go, and the Lady Cats connected on six of eight free throws in the final minutes to seal the Iowa State, playing the type of game that allowed the Cyclones to go 13-0 at home during the 1985-86 season, ambushed No. 15 Kansas 96-86 Tuesday night to break a three-game losing streak.

"My guys really played super.
That's the first time I've seen 'emplay like they did last year," said lowa State Coach Johnny Orr, who is 4-0 against Kansas Coach Larry Brown at Hilton Coliseum.

They really had intensity, they really went after it. It was a great win on our part. If we could just get that going every game like that, we could beat anybody."

Jeff Grayer scored 26 points and Tom Schafer added 25 to lead the way for lowa State, which had lost say of the previous according lost six of its previous seven games. The victory over the Big Eight Conference leader came ony three days after the Co had lost to last-place Colorado.

Orr credited his team's 3-2 zone defense for helping keep Kansas star Danny Manning in check.
Although Manning scored 30 points, Orr said the 6-foot-11 junior had to work hard to get them.

"He earned everything he got tonight, no question about that,"

Orr said. "We stuck with our thing right from the beginning and fortunately, our offense was good enough that we could stay with our defense.

We bung in there and took a chance on them shooting from outside and tried to shut Manning down as much as we could."

Brown, whose team had beaten lowa State 72-48 in Lawrence last month, said the Jayhawks got into a running game with the Cyclones and that's not their style.

"We shot the ball poorly. We're not a perimeter shooting team," Brown said. "We got caught up in the pace of the game and took a lot of quick outside shots.

"That's not our game and that was Iowa State's doing. That's the way they play and they play it bet-

Brown said he wouldn't have felt so bad about losing if his team had given a better effort.

"I don't think we played hard like we had to play to win," he said. "They were enthusiastic. They beat us to loose balls and on the offensive boards. We really hustled the last six or eight inutes of the game, but it's easy to hustle when you're 16 or 18 points down. That's nothing."

Sam Hill added 20 points and Elmer Robinson 14 for Iowa State.

Intense Cyclones Arbitration continues ambush Jayhawks for pro baseball stars

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - Don Mattingly of the New York Yankees on Tuesday became the highest-paid player produced by 13 years of salary arbitration, winning a one-year contract worth $1.975 million.

Reacting to the news from his Tampa, Fla., office, Yankees owner George Steinbrenner hinted he might file a grievance of the award, which surpassed the $1,850,000 contract won Friday by pitcher Jack Morris of the Detroit Tigers.

"He (Mattingly) and I were very close to an agreement, but both the player and his agent came back and said they were getting pressure from the union" to go through arbitration, Steinbrenner said. "I'm not sure that's totally ungrievable. It may be grievable.

Don Fehr, executive director of the Major League Players Association, called Steinbrenner's charge "patent claptrap.

'This is a bully acting like somebody in the corner," Fehr said. "Here's a man realizing now that he can't explain to the people of New York how he let all these star players who could have filled holes in his lineup get away.

'As to pressure, Mattingly did what he wanted," Fehr said. "As to, do we give players advice? Sure. George can file a grievance if he wants. It's just public relations." Despite the award, Mattingly still trails Jim Rice of the Boston Red Sox, Eddie Murray of the Baltimore Orioles and Mike Schmidt of the Philadelphia Phillies, who are believed to make more than $2 million a year.

The Yankees had offered Mattingly $1.7 million. Arbitrator Arvid Anderson heard the case Monday in New York and, restricted to picking either the figure offered by Mattingly or the Yankees, chose the larger amount.

Decisions also were reached Tuesday on two other arbitration cases heard the day before. Both players outfielder Kevin McReynolds of the New York Mets and pitcher Danny Cox of St. Louis - were losers.

Of the 19 cases resolved thus far, management has won 12.

Mattingly and his agent, Jim Krivacs of Clearwater, Fla., had been trying to negotiate a longterm deal with Yankees owner George Steinbrenner, who offered a two-year contract reportedly worth $3.5 million. Krivacs and Mattingly rejected the offer and decided to go through arbitration.

There were no darts thrown from their side to us, or from our side to them during the negotiations," Krivacs said.

Mattingly settled on the $1,975,000 figure as an apparent appeasement to Steinbrenner, who said he would refuse to make any new deals worth $2 million per year.

"I'm very happy and very pleased with the decision," Mattingly said through Krivacs."I'm happy that it's Mattingly won a Gold Glove at first base last year and batted .352 with 113 RBI and 31 homers. He set club records with 238 hits and 53 doubles. In 1985, Mattingly hit .324 with 35 homers and an American Leagueleading 145 RBI.

McReynolds, traded during the offseason from San Diego, had asked $825,000, while the Mets offered $625,000. Cox asked for $875,000, while St. Louis came in at $600,000.

McReynolds hit .288 with 26 homers and 96 RBI last year for the Padres. Cox was 12-13 with a 2.90 earned run average at St. Louis. "There's no animosity. It was a business decision," McReynolds said from his home in North Little Rock, Ark. "We tried our case and lost. The Mets didn't do anything that put me in a bad light."

Mets senior vice president Al Harazin said the club "obviously was very pleased with the result" of McReynolds' hearing. "We feel the whole process was very professional from both sides. Now we're looking forward to Kevin having a terrific first season with the Mets," Harazin

Hagler to lose title

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - Marvelous Marvin Hagler faced the possible loss of the World Boxing Association portion of his undisputed world middleweight title Tuesday, but he "is not losing any sleep over it," his co-manager said.

The WBA's Championship Committee voted unanimously to recommend that Hagler be stripped of recognition because he failed to defend the title within the required six months, association counsel James Binns said Tuesday.

Hagler's last defense took place last March when he defeated John Mugabi.

Morris Goldings, Hagler's attorney, said in Boston that he obtained a court order last week blocking any action by the WBA and that he would appeal the committee's vote, which was taken last week.

"Marvin is getting used to it," co-manager Pat Petronelli said of the vote which will be acted on by the WBA's Executive Committee. "Every time he fights, they threaten to strip his title."

Hagler also is recognized as champion by the World Boxing Council and the International Boxing Federation.

Kruger said he had no argument over the ruling.

"The officials handled the situation with decisiveness, you expect that from (official) Jim Bain," Kruger said. "I don't have any objections about what happened or what Steve did. Steve stood his ground and Alford stood his.'

Henson, on the other hand, said the officials didn't see everything.

"They didn't ever see who threw the first punch and he's the one that threw that ... even if it was an elbow," he said. "So they just called what they saw, I guess.

Henson said he has been in fights on the court "many times," but most

Q. Will any future questions even be read or considered by the Collegian's sports staff?

A. Of course. One of the best ways to let a newspaper person know their publication is being read is through letters to the editor. After all, we can't please the public if the public doesn't let us know what they prefer.

Mossman, although not thoroughly impressed with the play of her starters, said she was pleased by the aggressive play of the reserves.

'A lot of credit has to go to Janet Madsen, Leann Kuebelback, and Elyse Funk," Mossman said. "Elyse did a really good job of running the offense."

Funk, who saw 14 minutes of action, scored six points and took care of the ball at the point guard position and committed no turnovers.

ple did not realize it is positive, something to look forward to and something that can be a beautiful educational experience for children.

The purpose of educaton is to prepare students for the democratic society and to function in the real world, McGowan said. This cannot be accomplished if there are racial problems in the schools.

McGowan's solution to current problems similar to those Boston experienced is to let judges make decisions regarding the legality of desegregation, but involve people familiar with education and desegregation in the overall plann-

Donald Nieman, associate professor of history, said the central theme of the book is the depths of racial desegregation in urban settings of northern states.

'This is a problem that has no easy solutions and, in fact, may have no solutions whatsoever," he said.

The problem arose because blacks were the last major immigrant group to arrive in urban settings of northern states, Nieman said. They arrived in the 1930s, '40s and '50s. Because of their late arrival, blacks had to contend with people already living there.

'In addition to having to contend with those who had already entrenched the urban north, the blacks were faced with deep racial prejudice," he said. "This is the kind of prejudice that transcends the kind of prejudice that the Irish, Polish and Italians faced.'

Nieman said blacks were systematically pushed into menial occupations, thus experiencing unemployment and poverty.

"This was an atmosphere that wasn't very conducive to obtaining skills and education. It was an atmosphere that is more conducive to hopelessness than hopefulness," he said.

These problems lead to systematic housing and schooling segregation. Nieman said blacks were segregated into schools of lower quality, which in turn contributed to poorer life chances

Under the pressure of the civil rights movement in the 1950s and '60s, a number of extremely important changes were initiated, he said.

School desegregation, which is at the heart of Lukas' book, was enforced by busing, Nieman said. In addition, legislation was designed to stop job discrimination that urban blacks faced, and affirmative action was initiated.

> Don't get caught unprepared! Read Collegian Weather Forecasts

These changes, however, operated basically under the assumption that they would allow urban blacks to experience the same kind of opportunities whites experienced, he said.

This assumption rests on the false model of American social history and complete obliviousness to class as a reality in American society, Nieman said.

Studies show the idea of white ethnics pulling themselves up by their boot straps and experiencing substantial economic and social mobility is largely a myth, he said.

Groups without skills or property usually make very modest gains. They remain locked into blue-collar occupations and low-level whitecollar jobs, Nieman said.

One soluton to this problem is to resort to national economic planning, restore employment and make a serious attempt at redistribution of wealth, he said.

"This way there could be a decent standard of living, and a half step toward equality of opportunity.

"Without this kind of economic change, I seriously doubt that all gains of civil rights movement will do anything to put a dent, much less solve, in what is a growing problem of the urban black class," Nieman

Another problem with race and class in America is that the policies dealing with national integration have assumed that sane and rational people that get to know one another and understand one another will somehow also learn to get along with one another, said Aruna Michie, associate professor in political

"People think the way to integrate is to put them together, through desegregation of schools, for example," she said.

Although this makes sense theoretically, in reality it doesn't work, Michie said.

In most circumstances, when people of different cultures get together, they try to heighten their culture by pointing out the differences instead of the similarities.

Michie's proposed solution to the problem is to start with socializaton and, like Nieman, to require structuring of economic opportunities.

Local council recalls racial problems

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY Collegian Reporter

Members of the Manhattan Council on Human Relations spoke Tuesday in Farrell Library to promote mutual understanding concerning human rights and minorities.

The panel of four spoke of problems blacks faced in Manhattan during the 1960s and how they adapted to those problems.

Until the 1960s, blacks were not allowed to live north of Colorado Street. And the streets where they could reside were not paved. Some businesses did not serve blacks, while University students held demonstrations against blacks.

In 1961 The Manhattan Council on Human Relations was organized to create and promote mutual understanding and good will among Manhattan's racial and religious groups. It encourages efforts of individuals, neighborhoods and business firms to provide equal op-

Many improvements came about as a result of this organization's efforts, including fair housing, petitions to pave streets and enclose junk yards, posters for retailers to announce equal opportunity to trade and campus ministry involvement in the black culture.

One key event affecting the Manhattan and University communities was the visit of Martin Luther King Jr. in January 1968, 21/2 months before his assasination in Memphis in April.

"He said we've come a long way but we've got a long way to go,' said the Rev. Don Fallon, Lutheran campus minister. "We should love one another and we need one another."

Fallon said K-State administrators began recruiting blacks to come to K-State following King's visit. By talking to the students, he said they tried to understand how black students felt about the cultural differences between blacks and whites

Murt Hanks, Legal Employment Opportunity officer, described what it was like to be a black during the 1960s in Manhattan and stressed the importance of blacks to continue to assert themselves. Hanks was Manhattan's first black city commissioner and later served as mayor for two terms.

The members of the panel were: Hanks: Fallon: Madaline Sullinger, secretary of Urban Renewal; James Butler, chairman of the Civil Rights Commission; and Richard L.D. Morse, professor of family economics.

homesick. That kind of weather is common in England from about October until March.

"I also miss British television." He said in Britain there are four channels, and it is easy to find what is showing. He finds U.S. television, with its advertisements every 10 minutes, "very aggravating." Watney finds the traffic and the road signs in the united States "extremely confusing." He said people do curious things such as pull out in front of other people without signal-

"Beer is not one of the greatest things in the United States," Watney Fortney said the students' reaction to Watney has been extremely positive and enthusiastic.

"His professional attitude, expertise and willingness to teach amplify their feelings," he said.

Rape

"Men need to learn how to hear 'No," said Parker, who will lead Tuesday's discussion. "Men need to recognize women have a choice."

Margaret Grayden of Lafene Mental Health will lead Wednesday's discussion. Kris Kelderman, Riley County victim's advocate, will lead Thursday, and Dori Lambert, from the Counseling Center, will lead Fri-

Also during the week, volunteers trained by the Crisis Center will give presentations at sororities. They will explain what date rape is, how to avoid it, how to say "No" assertively and where to get help.

Parker had hoped to give the presentations at fraternities, but she didn't have the time or manpower to organize the presentations.

Men need to learn what date rape is and where to get help if they have ever committed it, Parker said. Men can carry guilt feelings if they have ever coerced a friend into sex, she said.

"Sometimes it is much more premeditated," Parker said.

Many times an upperclassman sees a vulnerable freshman woman, maybe "the ugly girl who can't get a date," and thinks he has an easy target, Parker said.

"I guess the problem is a basic disrespect for other people, namely women," Davis said.

Much of the problem is the inability of men and women to talk openly

Animal sciences quadrathlon helps to improve knowledge

By STACEY NANNINGA Collegian Reporter

To the 64 students participating in the sixth annual animal sciences and industry quadrathlon, the contest wasn't a matter of determining if the chicken or the egg came first - it was much more. Quadrathlon contestants participated in three days of intense competition. The contestants had to, among other things, take a surprise test, palpate a cow, speak on an unannounced topic to a panel of experts and answer questions while under time and competitors' pressure.

Tuesday night marked the final round of competition as two teams, each composed of four students, faced off in the quiz bowl finals.

The main objective of the competition was to provide a way for students to test their knowledge in a variety of areas and to improve in the areas they are lacking, said Ernest Minton, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry and cochairman of the event.

Minton said incorporating competition into the learning experience creates a great deal of fun and a more relaxed interaction between faculty and students.

in four types of competition: an oral presentation, a written exam, a laboratory practicum and the quiz bowl. Team scores are based on performance in all four areas.

The quiz bowl is a competition fashioned after many game shows.

Team members use a buzzer and light system to respond to questions. The button is pressed when a team member believes he knows the correct answer to the question being asked. Once the button is pressed, the team member has five seconds to state the correct answer.

The two teams who make it through the quiz bowl competition without a loss compete in the final round at the meeting of the K-State Block and Bridle Club.

The winner of the quiz bowl doesn't necessarily win the overall competition. The team with the lowest number of all-around points in all four phases of the competition wins the quadrathlon.

This year's winning team was Woody's Warriors. Team members were: Kim Buethe, Sally Hoffman and Howard Woodbury, juniors in animal sciences and industry, and Tim Coppinger, senior in animal sciences and industry.

"I can't believe we actually won the competition," Hoffman said. "We only placed first in one event. I guess that being a consistent third in the other categories really helped."

'The best part of the whole competition is the learning experience," Buethe said. "We all learned a lot and had fun doing it. The best part was the oral presentation. We really had a blast doing that."

"Our team members really complemented each other because we each had knowledge in different areas." Coppinger said.

The winning team will compete in the regional competition in Des Moines, Iowa, March 22 during the American Society of Animal Sciences meeting. Berl Koch, professor in animal sciences and industry and co-chairman of the quadrathlon, will accompany the

Bradley wins election by 38 votes

Manhattan, Kansas 66506

SGA records show tightest race since '74

By CHRIS DOLL and CHRIS STEWART Staff Writers

In the closest student body presidential run-off election in 13 years, Kent Bradley, junior in nutrition science, nipped Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, by

With his voice raspy from the effects of nearly 20 appearances in the last week in attempts to swing voters, Bradley made a telephone call to the Student Government Services office at about 7:30 p.m. Wednesday from the foyer of FarmHouse Fraterni-

Bradley calmly tallied the results on scratch paper and gave a victory nod to a group of fraternity brothers, who had huddled around the small phone booth in the fover of the house at 1830 College Heights

"You bet I'm going to celebrate," he said after learning of his narrow victory. "I'm going to try and get back and talk to the people who helped me, and let them share in this because it was a group effort.'

Meanwhile, Benoit sat at the Student Senate meeting anxiously tapping her foot while waiting for election results. The news would be the outcome of three months of campaigning.

The news came at about 7:20 p.m. A member of the SGA Election Committee motioned for Benoit to come outside.

"I'm sorry to inform you...," he began. "It was one of the closest ever," he ended.

There was a moment of silence. "You mean I lost by 38 votes," Benoit said. Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, set the official voter turnout at 2080. with Bradley receiving 1055 votes and Benoit 1017. Eight votes were declared invalid. SGA records show it was the tightest race since Mark Edelman defeated Maggie Vargas by 34 votes in the 1974 run-off election when 2,108 students cast ballots.

Bradley found it hard to attribute his victory to any one factor because the margin between the two candidates, who often shared the same views while campaigning, was slim

"I don't know what to attribute (the win) to exactly. I think personal contact and sincerity of listening to the students' views and concerns," Bradley said. "If someone brought up a concern with me I tried to find an answer and get back with them as soon as possible.' Bradley said his experience at K-State, particularly with the Student Alumni Board, and the new perspective he will bring to the office from not being a student senator helped him win the election.

Another force may have aided Bradley as

"Who knows," he said. "It might just be luck. Well, luck from a lot of hard work."

"The University is losing nothing in Kent Bradley," Benoit said. "I'm positive he'll do a great job." Bradley said the election was especially tough because Benoit was a presidential opponent and a close personal friend. "Michelle ran an excellent campaign. She was a very qualified candidate. I'm sure that's one of the reasons it was so close," he said. "I hope she stays involved in student government because she has a lot of good ideas."

An open-door policy will be the hallmark of his term in office, Bradley said.

"I'll be following Steven around like a puppy, learning as much as I can about how the position operates and how to be most effective," he said.

Bradley said he is not yet sure how many cabinet members he will select, or how his advisers will be structured.

Most of his time will be spent representing the student body, he said, rather than proposing legislation to the Senate. Later in his term, after committee approvals, Bradley may consider legislation on the Institutional Support Fee, the proposed Representation Enhancement Referendum, the main-"The position of student body president tainance of surveillance files on campus, and may form a peer evaluation team to survey classroom activities.

"As soon as the cabinet gets set up we are going to start working on the proposed evaluation system, and getting a committee to research the representation issue. We will look at how representation is run on many, many, many other campuses. We will get a broad-based view and let them come up with a proposal and let the students decide." he

Benoit would like to work on developing a freshman student council and a council representing off-campus students who are not affiliated with the greek system. Benoit said she also wants to work for Farrell Library accreditation.

One of the differences between her and Bradley's platforms, Benoit said, was their philosophies of delegating authority.

Senate approves 5 revisions in SGA constitution, bylaws

By MICHAEL MORRIS

Collegian Reporter Student Senate Wednesday night passed five Student Governing. Association constitutional and bylaw

Of those five, Senate passed a revision to change the date of elections to the third full week before Thanksgiving break. The revision states it is necessary to provide sufficient time for the Senate chairman to select the ex-the semester.

Also passed was a revision establishing a SGA treasurer position. Sally Traeger, senior in marketing, Senate chairwoman and sponsor of the revision, said the position is necessary because no one person represents SGA during the allocations process. Traeger said the position would be of interest to students in accounting looking for a internship. Senate also passed ecutive committee before the end of limiting the amount of time a next week, the student activity fee referendum petition can circulate to 60 days during one academic school

These revisions must now be approved by six of the nine college

In addition, Senate approved the Human Ecology Council constitution and bylaw revisions.

In other action, Senate heard the first reading of a bill restructuring the student activity fee.

If the bill is passed during Senate will be decreased; however, three separate student fees will be created.

The three proposed student fees fund the Union, Student Publications, Inc. and Recreational Services. Brett Bromich, senior in marketing, said in the past there has not been time to review these organizations' large budgets during the allocations process. Dave Adams, director of Student Publications, agreed with Bromich.

"Restructuring of the student activity fee would allow Student Publications ample time to justify what we are doing with student fee money." Adams said.

However, if the restructuring bill is defeated next week, a bill will be introduced to increase the entire student activity fee to accommodate the Union and Student Publications.

The bill also states the two organizations operated at a deficit during the 1985-86 fiscal year, and they are projected to do so again during the 1986-87 fiscal year.

Adams said the combination of declining enrollment, loss of advertising, and the recently assessed administrative service charge has resulted in the need for the increase.

On the other hand, if the restructuring of the activity fee were to pass next week, a bill would be introduced to increase the line item for Union and Student Publications fees. however, not Recreational Services, Bromich said.

Soviets pardon anti-Zionist activist

GENEVA - Soviet authorities have signed an unconditional pardon for imprisoned Jewish activist Josef Begun, a Soviet official said Wednesday.

Samuel Zivs, head of the Soviet Anti-Zionist Committee and Vice President of the Soviet-American Friendship Association, said Soviet President Andrei Gromyko or one of his deputies signed the pardon Tuesday night.

Zivs was in Geneva for the current session of the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

Earlier Wednesday, Yelena Bonner, wife of Nobel Peace Prize laureate Andrei Sakharov, said in Moscow there were no news of the 55-year-old Begun.

Georgy Arbatov, head of the Soviet Union's U.S.A.-Canada Institute, said in a televised interview last weekend that Begun already had been freed. But on Tuesday, Soviet Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov said authorities would "most likely" free Begun.

Begun's family has said officials at Chistopol Prison, about 500 miles east of Moscow, told them Begun still was imprisoned there. Begun was sentenced in 1981 to seven years in prison for alleged anti-Soviet activities.

One dead in Colorado avalanche

BRECKENRIDGE, Colo. - A massive avalanche swept down a mountainside near Breckenridge ski area Wednesday, killing at least

With fresh snow squalls and temperatures dropping to the single digits, 30 professional rescuers, aided by search dogs, planned to continue searching through the night for two others reported missing, said Summit County Sheriff Delbert Ewolt.

Searchers had been at work for more two hours when they pulled a man from snow ranging from 20 to 30 feet, said Summit County Undersheriff Gary Lindstrom. The man's identity was being withheld pending notification of relatives, said a statement issued by Breckenridge Ski Area officials. It was unclear exactly how many people were trapped in the avalanche because eyewitness accounts varied. Lindstrom said a witness believed six people were trapped, and radio station KSMT reported a witness said four people were missing in the snowslide.

The avalanche cut a swath a half mile wide and left a 10-foot deep fissure on Peak Seven before carrying into a gully more than a mile below, said Lindstrom.

Farm act ruled unconstitutional

TOPEKA — The Kansas Legislature's major effort in recent years to do something to help financially embattled farmers was struck down as unconstitutional Wednesday by the state Supreme Court.

It was a law enacted in 1986 which lawmakers called the Family Farm Rehabilitation Act.

It allowed farmers facing foreclosures on their property to petition in court to have the foreclosure proceedings delayed one year at a time for up to three years while they tried to restructure their debts. The law required they continue to make interest payments during the

The Federal Land Bank of Wichita challenged the law as a violation of Article 1 of the U.S. Constitution, which says states cannot pass laws which interfere with legal contracts.

Committee rejects aid to Contras

WASHINGTON - The Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 11-9 Wednesday to halt U.S. aid to Nicaragua's anti-government guerrillas in the first major test of sentiment in the new Congress toward the Contras.

However, even supporters of the measure passed by the Democratic-controlled committee conceded it will be vetoed by President Reagan if it eventually passes the Senate and the House.

"I think we have the votes on the floor to pass it, but of course the president will veto it and I doubt that we can override the veto," said Sen. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., chairman of the panel and an opponent of Contra aid. No action by the full Senate is likely for several weeks,

The vote came after more than three hours of debate in which both sides repeated their arguments favoring or opposing the program.

Reagan remains silent over scandal

WASHINGTON - President Reagan refused to answer questions Wednesday about the Iran-Contra scandal, while Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger said the administration had secretly provided intelligence information to both sides in the Iran-Iraq war.

Reagan maintained his 21/2 month silence while Robert Gates was undergoing a second tough day of questioning at his Senate confirmation hearing to take over as CIA director. Elsewhere in Congress, the Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted narrowly to cut off further aid to the Contra rebels fighting the Nicaraguan government.

Reagan seemed in no mood to field questions on the controversy when reporters were permitted into the Oval Office before his meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

"I'm not going to take any questions on that situation until after a presidential commission files its report on the Iran-Contra affair on Feb. 26," Reagan said. He refused to elaborate on his previous comment that mistakes had been made and declined to identify who had been guilty of the errors.

Director admits to hiring children

LOS ANGELES - Director John Landis, defending himself in the "Twilight Zone" movie set deaths of actor Vic Morrow and two children, testified Wednesday he knowingly broke the law by hiring the youths without permits.

The bearded, bespectacled director, telling his story publicly for the first time, also said no one warned him the scene in which a crashing helicopter killed the children and Morrow was dangerous.

'Did anyone suggest using dummies or puppets because of danger to the children?" defense attorney James Neal asked in the hushed, packed courtroom.

"No," said Landis, who along with four associates is charged with involuntary manslaughter.

Landis claimed a suggestion to not use the children was made only to avoid having them work after dark in violation of the labor code. He said he did not apply for permits for the children because of the state law.

The testimony came as Landis described a meeting with associates in which they talked of using children in a scene to be filmed after dark and about the restriction on using children late at night.

"Our state of mind was this didn't meet our needs," said Landis. "What was your decision?" asked Neal.

"We decided to break the law," he said. "We decided wrongly to violate the labor code."

'Required' shots unenforceable, official says

By STACEY CAMPBELL Collegian Reporter

A University policy requiring all students to receive immunizations cannot be enforced, said Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene Student Health Center.

In the K-State Immunization Requirement Policy, all students who were born in 1957 or later are required to have polio, tetanus, rubella, measles and mumps immunizations.

Students may receive these immunizations free from Lafene. However, Lafene has no way to enforce this request, Burke said. "The doctors and nurses that have direct care of the students question about student immunization," Burke said. "Besides this, we have no recourse as far as enforcing the policy.

Measles, mumps and rubella immunizations should be repeated if the last time a student was immunized was prior to 1969, she said.

In addition, the tetanus immunization should be repeated at least every 10 years. If a person sustains an injury like a puncture to the skin, Burke said an immunization is addent health to incoming freshmen and their parents during the summer orientation.

"I stress to the parents the need to have the student's immunization upto-date," Burke said. Lafene offers a health history form which has a section for immunization.

> The department suggests that all students under the age of 30 be adequately immunized against measles and rubella, said Robert Snyder, director of immunization for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

"The rationale as to why we urge the adoption of policy for measles and rubella is because they continue to be a problem on college campuses," Snyder said.

Snyder cited six cases of measles on Kansas' college campuses in 1986.

"If there had been a (immunization) policy in the schools, the students most likely would not have gotten it (measles)," Snyder said. The vaccine is 95 percent effective."

Burke said there are some cases of measles but rarely are mumps reported to the clinic.

However, no records are kept at Lafene on how many cases of measles, mumps or rubella are confirmed each year, she said.

Snyder said the state health and environment department surveyed 50 colleges and universities in Kansas. Thirty-four colleges responded to the survey, and only 11 indicated that they required students to have proof of immunization for student registration in classes, he said. Only eight of the 11 colleges adopted the Students wanting to update their immunizations should go to Lafene, pick up their records and take them to the allergy clinic, Burke said.

Blending a structure into its surrounding environment was the focus of a presentation given Wednesday night by Peter Bohlin, a Pennsylvania architect and educator.

"One of the great joys in architecture is relating a structure to its particular site," Bohlin said at a lecture to about 150 students and faculty from the College of Archictecture and Design.

Bohlin, the design principal of the Bohlin, Powell, Larkin and Cywinski architectural firms in Pennsylvania, gave a slide presentation covering much of his firm's recent work. The presentation's intent was to show how structures can be incorporated into unique building sites. Bohlin began his lecture by showing numerous slides of a house he designed and built for his parents. Nestled in a Connecticut forest, it is predominantly green and low slung, allowing it to blend into the landscape. The house inand a unique deck molded onto a rocky hillside.

Bohlin said the house was built only a few hundred yards from an area where he spent much of his childhood, so additional steps were taken to incorporate memories and impressions that he and his parents shared about the site. The next portion of the lecture dealt with another house that presented a unique problem to his firm. A Philadelphia bachelor wanted to build a house that would incorporate the ruin of an old stone barn that existed on the Behlin's firm did so by designing a narrow three-story house within the confines of the ruin. The walls of the old barn were then used as an indoor/outdoor courtyard. The house again used large areas of glass that looked out over the man's garden and the courtyard.

In the final portion of the program, Bohlin showed slides of the headquarters area of a Girl Scout camp in the Philadelphia area

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Druse militiamen stormed Beirut's Commodore Hotel on Wednesday, routing Shiite Moslem fighters as fierce battles raged for a fourth day in west

Police said at least 25 fighters were killed and 80 wounded in fighting around the hotel and the American University of Beirut in the city's Moslem sector. The casualties raised the toll since fighting broke out Sunday to at least 65 killed and 280 wounded.

the lobby, their sub-machine guns trained on the entrance.

Amal militiamen took up positions in an apartment building facing the hotel, and the two sides traded rocket-propelled grenades and shoulder-fired rockets. A Syrian-sponsored cease-fire took effect at midnight, but was shattered late this morning when Druse and Communist fighters attacked Amal headquarters near the university. Syrian military observers tried unsuccessfully to curtail the outbreak. The seven-story Commodore took direct hits early in the day as gunmen from both sides exchanged rocket and machine gun fire.

The second-floor office of the CBS television network across the street from the hotel was hit by a rocketpropelled grenade, but office manager Walid Harati said there were no casualties.

This week's fighting has been the fiercest in west Beirut in three years and the worst since Syria sent troops into the Moslem sector of the Lebanese capital last summer to end a wave of militia lawlessness.

Syria backs all three factions involved in the fighting. They ostensibly are allies in the nearly 12-yearold civil war against Lebanon's Christians, but periodically fight each other for domination of the capital's Moslem sector.

Syria, the main power broker in Lebanon, maintains 25,000 troops in north and east Lebanon and 500 in west Beirut under a 1976 Arab League peacekeeping mandate.

The pro-Moscow Communists have battled intermittently with the main Shiite militia Amal since the 1982 Israeli invasion, when the Shiites began moving in on the Communist power base in south Lebanon.

Last year, the Communists joined the Druse militia, the pro-Syrian Baath Party and Lebanon's leftist Syrian Social Nationalist Party in a new coalition called the National Democratic Front.

In separate fighting, Amal has besieged Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut for three months. Berri told reporters Tuesday in Damascus, the Syrian capital, that his militia would lift the siege Wednesday and begin letting food through.

Gorbachev's changes signify enlightenment

In fact, Gorbachev may be rewriting the book. Two weeks ago in the Kremlin, the general secretary told 307 members of the General Assembly that the Soviet Union is in a state of disarray, citing proplems within the system including the unwillingness to change, dishonest party officials and alcohol and drug abuse. During the speech, Gorbachev also criticized past Soviet leaders who

Thus, Gorbachev announced a new policy of glasnost, or openness. The goal of his new policy is to speed economic growth and modernization in the Soviet

During the speech, Gorbachev asked the party to approve the changes, one of which included secret-ballot elections between more than one candidate.

It was reported Feb. 10 that for the first time the Soviet Union held a two-candidate, secretballot election for a regional Communist Party post in Siberia. Although far from the entrenched views of Moscow, the election is very significant because it provides an outward display of

> Some residents are skeptical about registering for that program, however, because they are afraid the changes may not be permanent and under a different leader they be punished for their activity.

This is why it is important for Gorbachev to persuade his colleagues on the Politburo, especially middle and lower-level party members who are the future leaders, that the changes are needed.

If Gorbachev is rewriting the book, the question remains, will the bureaucratic censors put a stop to his work?

We decided to do Mexico.

The only tip I knew about visiting Mexico was don't drink the water. Now I know a few more: Don't walk along the beaches at Tijuana wearing cameras around your necks; don't assume that the nice man who follows you all along the beach and then asks you if you need a smoke is trying to sell you a pack of Marlboros; and don't tell the customs officers at the border on your way out that all you did in Mexico was drive around.

Realizing we hadn't yet visited the lovely southern California beaches, Jonie and I headed west.

Discovering a parking lot jammed with cars, we decided we must have stumbled on to something big.

We stumbled on something, all right, but it wasn't big - it was brown. Instead of a beach speckled with seashells, we had found one dotted with dog droppings. Canines of every kind were frolicking in the sand as their masters glowed with pride. Luckily, not every event was a disaster. We did manage to get in on the America's Cup Celebration and had the unique opportunity to attend a lecture by former hostage Benjamin Weir. We also had the opportunity to visit Sea World. I was reflecting on those positive points as I pushed the elevator button to go to my room on the final night in San Diego.

Heck, I decided, this hasn't been so bad. From here on out, it'll be smooth sailing.

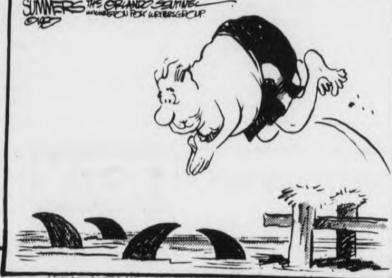

The door opened. Four glassy-eyed men stood looking at me. I cautiously stepped in and pushed the button.

"Hey, guys, we're moving again," stuttered the one leaning against the railing. "I thought we'd be stuck here all night."

"I wonder what this other red button is for? " asked the one by the controls.

And with that I learned one final tidbit of information. On an elevator, the button marked "A" is for "alarm."

Amid 'Amerika' fuss, U.S. apathy apparent

"Amerika," a drama about life in America under Soviet rule, began a seven-day, 141/2-hour run on ABC Sunday night. However, this mini-series met with widespread criticism even before it made its debut.

The Soviets are criticizing it because they see it as American war propaganda which shows the Russians as the aggressive party.

Conservatives are criticizing the movie because they feel it goes too easy in its depiction of the Soviets. They feel it doesn't concentrate enough on the "evilness" of the Soviet system.

Liberals are criticizing the movie because they believe it is anti-Soviet propoganda which will bring about a hysteria among Americans and a renewed buildup in defense.

There are even those who criticize the movie on the basis that it is anti-American. They feel cheated because they believe it depicts America as a country with no will to resist.

With all this criticism fogging the scene, it is hard to see what is indeed the true statement the movie is making. Both the actors and the creators of this drama have said one of the basic reasons "Amerika" was made was to stir country.

up uebate among apathetic Americans.

"Amerika" did indeed create debate among Americans. It has reached such proportions that observers see a ring of 1950s "Mc-Carthyism" in some of the debaters' rhetoric. One thing this drama has proven is that Americans love to argue about communism.

However, the sad thing coming out of all this debate over the movie is just that...it's ONLY a movie. Debating the values and faults of the American and Soviet systems is very beneficial, but the debate over this movie lacks substance. Americans are splitting hairs over whether Soviets are truly evil, evil in part or just as evil as Americans.

Meanwhile, most of these same Americans barely take enough time to look over their coffee to the morning newspaper to read about the problems and controversies going on in Nicaragua, South Africa, El Salvador — all the real problems in the world to-

This movie does indeed define American apathy. Americans show little interest in the world's problems until the word "communism" is associated with this

Reagan searching for 'trig

Editor's note: This is the second part of a two-part series on America's policies in Central America.

As was stated yesterday, the Reagan administration is looking for a reason to invade Nicaragua. President Reagan has shown considerable contempt for the Nicaraguan people who have the audacity to think they have the right of self-determination. You see, in Reagan's game of politics, you play by his rules or you don't play at all because it's his hemisphere.

For the United States to send troops to Nicaragua, a trigger is needed. This trigger has to act much like the Gulf of Tonkin incident in Vietnam. This time, however, the administration will have to do a better job. Many people place part of the American failure in Vietnam on the fact that the Gulf of Tonkin incident was soon discovered to be a fabrication. The Reagan adminstration is going to have to come up with a real attack this time, and not a fake. The sad part is I think they found a way to do it.

On September 28, 1983, a battle broke out between Sandinista soldiers and Contra rebels on the border between Costa Rica and Nicaragua. By nightfall, Sandinista troops had pursued the Contras several hundred yards inside Costa Rican territory. Costa Rican Defense Minister Angel Edmundo Solano telephoned Nicaraguan Interior Minister Tomas Borge and managed to defuse the situation. Borge promised that no Sandinista troops would be on Costa Rican soil by 5 a.m. Sept. 29.

Solano said this situation "was the closest Costa Rica had ever come to being at war." Costa Rica's constitution prohibits a standing army and only allows for a small national guard force. With no army, they wouldn't stand a chance against an invasion from Nicaragua. Many members of the cabinet wanted to ask the United States for help from the invading Nicaraguans, but Solano managed to quiet them by assuring them no Sandinistas remained on Costa Rican soil.

This incident illustrates the tension that exists on the borders of Nicaragua. But, as Solano later found out, it was two CIA operatives, Harold Martinez and a Colombian known only as "Ivon," who had planned the attack in order to draw the Sandinistas across the border. This is just the kind of incident the Reagan administration is looking for. If the situation had not been resolved so quickly, the United States might have added yet another entry to its long list of interventions in Latin America. This wasn't the only attempt by the CIA to bring American troops into the war. Defense Minister Solano also recalled another incident when a Costa Rica radio station reported that 1,000 Sandinista troops had crossed the border at Cerro de las Mercedes. He immediately called Nicaraguan Vice President Sergio Ramirez, who assured Solano the report was false. Solano later found out the 1,000 Sandinistas were actually Contras dressed in Nicaraguan uniforms.

The Reagan administration didn't appreciate Solano's investigative work. "The U.S. Ambassador was telling people I had studied law at Patrice Lumumba University in Moscow. It was an absolute lie." He was later forced to resign under pressure from the United States and is now ambassador to Mexico. This story lends some credence to the joke, "The United States is the only country that has never had a military coup because it is the only country that doesn't have an American embassy.'

Solano's resignation didn't stop the information from leaking out. In 1985, two American mercenaries, Steven Carr and Peter Glibbery came to work with the Contras and were arrested soon afterward by Costa Rican officials. They were told their chief mission was "to raise hell on the border." They identified John Hull, a wealthy rancher living in Costa Rica, as their "liaison" with the CIA.

They discussed several plans, such as firing on a Costa Rican town with a Soviet mortar to make it look like the Sandinistas did it. Glibbery was sentenced to five years in a Costa Rican prison, while Carr skipped bail and returned to the United States where he was found dead in a parking lot in Los Angeles. Before he died, he told reporters, "When all this comes out, they'll either have to indict me or kill me.'

Taking into account these schemes the Reagan administration is using to provoke a war, another event also takes on a different meaning. When Congress was about to vote on aid to the Contras last spring, a big deal was made about several hundred Sandinista troops crossing the border into Honduras chasing after the Contras. The United States offered $20 million in emergency military aid to Honduras, which was used to transport a few thousand Honduran soldiers to the border by air. At first, Honduran officials refused the aid. But after they were threatened by the American ambassador with a total cutoff of all aid, they accepted.

At the time, this seemed to be a strange set of events. Why would Honduras refuse military aid when Sandinista soldiers were on their soil? Later on, we learned Nicaragua had always notified Honduras of any intrusions beforehand. This way Honduras could get their troops out of the way and avoid a conflict. The Hondurans know the Sandinistas are only chasing after the Contras. They didn't want to move their troops to the border, but the Americans wanted them to. If Honduran and Sandinista troops were ever to be caught up in a major skirmish, it would give the Reagan administration the trigger it is looking for. After all, there are already American troops in Honduras, along with six American-built airfields from which American planes could attack Nicaragua.

What we are looking at is an attempt by our government to embroil us in another unjust war. Maybe it won't be as horrible or costly as the war in Vietnam, but unjust all the same. The people who will really suffer are those our government is claiming to try to help, the Nicaraguans. When will Reagan and his people learn that the most important right is that of self-determination?

Correction

Due to an editor's error, a word in Kirk Caraway's column in Wednesday's Collegian was changed. Instead of Nicaragua being "a two-day drive from Arlington, Texas," the quote, made by President Reagan, should have read "a two-day drive from Harlingen.

Comedy mixes romance, controversy

By ANDRE KELLEY Collegian Reviewer

Finally, this campus is getting a controversial and very important black production. The film is the romantic comedy, "She's Gotta Have It," and incredibly it was written, directed, edited and even stars Spike Lee.

Film Review

A small but very loud and controversial man, Lee hates being compared to anyone. But because of the film's success (even though it's in very limited release) he's been called everything from a black Woody Allen to a cinematic

The film has been critically acclaimed for its very small budget, short production schedule and its formidable unknown talents and the thought-provoking characters that they play.

The film's central character, Nola Darling (Tracy Camilia Johns), is witty, insightful, buoyant and is being pursued and pressured by three men. All three are sleeping with her, and all three want her for rangement works out fine for Nola. She's fiercely independent and doesn't really care what people say or think about her. You can't help but laugh and agree with her when she sums up men in two categories: "decents and dogs.

The film is made up with a number of monologues from all the people who know the "real" Nola and what they think about her. The story is played out between the monologues and frequently, characters overlap and come into conflict. None of them get along and yet all are in love with the same

The guys chasing her are hilariously unique in their own way and all have something that "she's gotta have.'

Jamie (Redmon Hicks) is her realistic, romantic suitor. He's probably the only one of the three she takes seriously. He's essentially monogamous and as much as he wants Nola, he later sums her up as "sugar: sweet in your mouth and bitter in your stomach."

The semi-refined Greer (John Canada Terrell) is a GQ cover model and he's as conceited as he is challow. His idea of foreplay is tak-

Despite their protest, this ar- ing off his clothes (which he folds along the way) while admiring his own biceps. He claims that Nola was his "clay" and he was the sculptor. And since he can't possibly believe that she couldn't settle for him, he believes that Nola's problem is both sexual and

Finally there's Mars Blackmon (played by Lee himself), and this 10-speed-riding, Air Jordan-wearing "def dude" is as irritating as he is funny. He is hilarious with his "Maddie 'n Dave" rambling and competes with Nola's lovers by bagging on them. At one point he refers to Jamie as a "16-piece Chicken McNugget head."

In addition to these thugs, Nola's even pursued by a lesbian named Opal (Raye Dowell). But she juggles them all in her own endearing fashion and even tries to unite them at a Thanksgiving meal which ends up being one of the wildest guesswho's-coming-to-dinner themes you'll ever see

Lee not only took a chance in making the film on a modest budget but also by filming it in black and white, of which many of today's audiences are leery. However his professional direction and use of backlighting, still shots, slow pans and blurred photogaphy, further prove that he may indeed be one of today's most inventive director's.

Lee succeeds where Prince and his terrible "Under the Cherry Moon" failed miserably. His use of black and white gives the film depth and texture while sharpening the themes of black relationships and a woman's needing to be loved versus her need for independence.

And true to Lee's criticism of most Hollywood productions (not being realistic with subject matter dealing with blacks), the film is refreshingly frank. It's sheer straightforward, positive attitude doesn't sacrifice any of the blackness of its characters, their language or their actions. And best of all, he did it with a contemporary setting, mature personas and with a strong, clever and entertaining

Black or white, anyone will enjoy "She's Gotta Have It" but watch it closely because you just might miss more than a few hip words.

The film, which is rated R, will be showing today at 3:30 p.m. in Union Little Theatre and 7:30 p.m. in

Board approves AIDS class to inform Tucson students

By The Associated Press

TUCSON, Ariz. — The Tucson Unified School District's governing board has unanimously approved an AIDS course for middle school and high school pupils.

Board member Eva K. Bacal voted for the proposal Tuesday, but she said she was concerned about using class time "for a social service" and would prefer to see an after-school program developed.

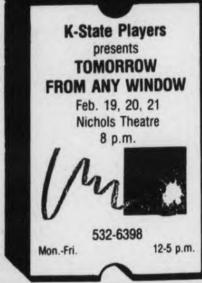

Teachers will be trained in March

Rheumatic fever back as health threat

By The Associated Press

BOSTON - A recent rheumatic fever outbreak of nearly epidemic proportions shows this once-common childhood illness still is a health threat in the United States, resear-

While the disease remains a major worldwide problem, it has nearly disappeared in the United States since World War II. However, a series of regional outbursts, including a particularly severe one in Utah that came to an abrupt halt last November, raises troubling hints that rheumatic fever could return.

The outbreaks mean physicians should take strep throat infections in Varieties of the streptococcal bacteria that can cause sore throats may also cause rheumatic fever, which can damage the heart valves.

Rheumatic fever traditionally is thought to be a disease of overcrowding and poverty. With improving living conditions and the development of antibiotics, the disease ceased to be a major concern in the United States.

However, during the last two years, 121 cases were reported in Utah, most of them among relatively well-off families. The rate for Salt Lake County alone was 18 times the

At the U.S. Center for Disease Control in Atlanta, Dr. Suzanne Laussucq said smaller clusters of cases have recently been spotted in Ohio, Colorado and California. Of 24 states that still keep records on rheumatic fever, eight reported at least 50 percent increases over the

It's possible that particularly virulent forms of the strep bacteria have re-emerged and will cause more rheumatic fever, she said.

In an editorial published with the study, Dr. Alan L. Instead, he urged physicians to use diagnostic tests to pinpoint the germ that's causing the Snow Creek Ski area, located 26 miles north of Kansas City, Mo., and three miles north of Weston, Mo., on Highway 24, offers skiing on lighted slopes, allowing night skiing. Bryan Carey, director of Early morning skiers glide down "Six shooter," an intermediate slope. Visitors ride one of two ski lifts to the top of the one-third mile run.

Whisking past novice skiers, the skier picks up speed with every se-cond before coasting to a halt at the base of the man-made mountain.

This is the world of Missouri's Snow Creek ski area.

Located 26 miles north of Kansas City and three miles north of Weston, Mo., on U.S. Highway 45, Snow Creek has been open to skiers since Dec. 31.

Distance and convenience are two main reasons why area skiers decide to ski Snow Creek.

"If you have a notion to go skiing over a weekend, Snow Creek is so over a weekend, Snow Creek is so much more convenient than driving all the way to Colorado," said Rhonda Harold, junior in psychology.

For those contemplating a ski trip, three hours traveling time to Snow Creek, compared to 10-15 hours driving to Colorado ski resorts makes the Missouri ski area appealing to many.

The ski area, a $2.5 million project nestled in the scenic Missouri River nestled in the scenic Missouri River bluffs, offers nine intermediate and two beginner slopes.

Snow Creek does not rely on Mother Nature's snow. The ski area relies on artificial snow, viewing natural snowfall as more of a "mood maker" rather than a necessity for great skiing.

Snow-making systems enable ski areas to be located in regions never before considered suitable for skiing. Man-made snow is a mixture of Missouri River water and compressed air blown into the air by fans. The process of manufacturing snow will only work in freezing temperatures.

Harold said she believes novice skiers will enjoy learning to ski at Snow Creek because it is "smaller and more personable than places in Colorado." Snow Creek offers lessons for every level of ability.

Advanced skiers may ski Snow their "ski legs" back at the beginning of the season. It is also a good place to practice and warm up before a person heads to the bigger slopes in Colorado. Harold said.

Snow Creek is as scenic as the mountains in Colorado, said Skip Knight, sophomore in pre-veterinary

"When you are on the lifts it looks a lot like Colorado," he said.

Although the ski slope is on a hill, it feels like a mountain, Harold said.

Harold said an advanced skier might not be as challenged by some of the runs at Snow Creek, which are shorter, as they would be in Col-

Knight said the narrower and shorter runs and the large number of beginning skiers at the Missouri area would limit the freedom for an advanced skier.

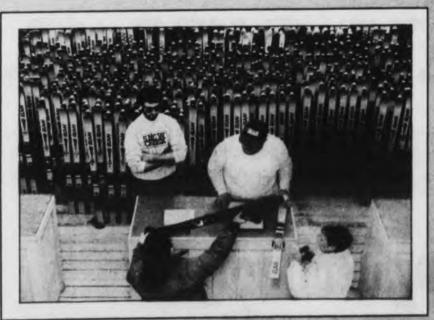

In addition to its Midwestern location, Snow Creek is different from many ski areas because it offers night skiing on lighted slopes. People can ski at night from 5 p.m. to 10 on weekdays and 24 hours on Friday and Saturday.

Fewer people ski at night. One pro-blem is the cold temperature that sets in after the sun has disappeared for the day, Knight said.

Bryan Carey, director of the Snow Creek ski school, said people are un-familiar with night skiing because they "think that you can't see as well where you are going, but actually you can see better at night."

Carey takes a quick jaunt down "Rattle Snake" slope. Snow Creek employs 50 ski instructors who teach private and group Employees Mike Graham and George Turpin assist skiers in selecting skis of proper length from among 1,000 pairs of rental skis available.

Snow Creek offers closeness and availability to two patrons whose plans for a trip to Colorado were altered by bad weather.

KU's court leaders strive for differing goals

Brown now relaxing while Manning soars

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE - About a month ago the two strongest forces in University of Kansas basketball had a meeting of minds.

Danny Manning, KU's master player, drifted into the office of Larry Brown, the Jayhawks' master coach. Manning asked Brown to please ease up on criticism

"That gets old after a while," said Manning, recalling the meeting. "There's no need pushing it on and

Brown backed off.

Manning's play became noticeably better after a Jan. 11 game at Oklahoma State in which he had a season-low eight points and five rebounds

In games since the meeting, he has added four points to his average (22.0) - in the past six games he's averaged 29 points per outing — improved his shooting percentages markedly, and felt, he said, "much more at ease.

They had a second meeting at Brown's home one night, attended also by Ed Manning, Danny's father and one of Brown's assistant coaches and a long-time friend. They discussed Danny's role and what Brown expects of him.

Everybody knows Brown stomps, yells, and rides herd on his players. But nobody has accused him of not stopping to listen - especially when the speaker stands 6-feet-11, scores more than 20 points a game, and is more like a son than one of his players.

"We've been struggling, me and Danny," Brown said shortly after the discussions with Manning.

Manning was dogged by Brown's demanding. reprimanding style.

"Every time I made a mistake I'd be looking over at the bench and thinking, 'Ah, geez,' and I'd be tight," Manning said. "Now, when I make a mistake, it's OK. I just go on and try not to make it again."

Brown said, "I learned something. For Danny to be his best, I've got to let him relax and play." In his office about two weeks ago, the morning after a double-overtime victory against the Wildcats, Brown reflected on events of the last month.

"Sometimes no matter what you think you know as a coach you have to be told again," he said.

"These kids are really important. I was reminded that when they're on the court, they've got to know you're completely behind them. If there's a problem in communication of that, it has to be corrected.

"That was a heck of statement Danny made, and it made me sit back and think. It took a lot of courage for him to do it, too.'

Manning smiled, remembering the day he strolled into Brown's office.

"You can think of a lot of things you want to say," Manning said, "and then his presence makes you lose a few things. You look at him and think, 'Goll-ee, I can't

"Coach is intimidating. He's going to yell, he's going to stomp his foot. It's a given. You know it's coming. He's a perfectionist. So am I, but we're perfectionists

"Like I believe I can play close to a perfect game but still make some mistakes and feel good about it. Coach believes a perfect game is absolutely no mistakes." Brown had been showing increasing impatience with Manning disappearing from KU's game plan.

Check the first three games at the outset of January: Manning scored four points in the second half of a loss at Wichita State, made the first shot of the game and attempted no more shots in the first half of a victory over Temple, and scored two points in the first half in a victory at Oklahoma State.

These games came after a frustrating visit to the Hawaiian Islands during which Manning registered 14 fouls in three games, fouling out of losses to Pittsburgh and Ohio State.

Manning thought he needed respite from Brown's barking. Brown thought Manning also needed definition. What, precisely, did Brown expect of this 20-yearold, who in his third year has attained superstar status?

So, in the presence of both Mannings, Brown detailed what he looks for from Danny.

"What we stressed," Ed Manning said, "was that Danny had to work hard to get the ball, make them (opponents) honor him."

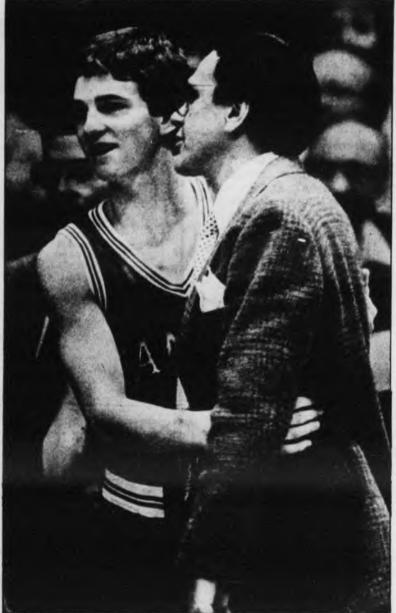

In only one game since the Manning-Brown huddle, a victory on Jan. 31 at Louisville, has a team effectively defensed Manning. He got only five shots, scored eight points and had four rebounds against the defending Brown described Manning as "a player who makes players around him better and turns a good team into a great one.

"Danny went through a real difficult time. People look to him to carry us," Brown said. "To think that you have to get every point, every rebound, make every play is too much for anyone to bear. He's not that kind of person to take on that burden."

Kansas coach Larry Brown has eased his criticism of Danny Manning, allowing his star's game to improve. "For Danny to be his best, I've got to let him relax and play," Brown said.

Mark Turgeon plans to stay with the Jayhawks as a graduate assistant following this season and continue toward a career in coaching.

Turgeon's wish turns into coaches' jackpot

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

Mark Turgeon has overcome the odds set against him after he finished his high school basketball

Much to his disappointment, after finishing his final two prep seasons in which the 5-foot-10 guard led Topeka Hayden to consecutive state championships and earned All-State honors his senior year, he was shunned by major college programs.

"It was disappointing, but I didn't let that discourage me from trying. That's when I approached Coach Brown," Turgeon said.

What he was referring to is a meeting with Kansas coach Larry Brown before his freshman year at Kansas, when Turgeon told the KU coach he wanted to play for the Jayhawks at point guard. With starter Cedric Hunter ineligible to play, Brown obliged Turgeon's wish by giving him the chance one Brown says he doesn't regret.

Since joining Kansas, Turgeon has become a vital player for the Jayhawks. In his freshman year he played in 26 games, started in 18 and dished out a Kansas the 1984-85 season, Turgeon continued to contribute, playing in 33 games with 102 assists. All done set an example for other kids." despite playing slightly more than 10 minutes a contest.

Last season, Turgeon said playing on such a successful Kansas team was the high point of his career. Taking the court in all 39 games, his most instrumental role came in Kansas' NCAA national semifinal game against Duke.

"(Making it to the final four) was definitely the highlight of my career so far," he said. "It's something that every college said.

In that game, Turgeon played 19 minutes, handed out five assists and scored two points.

Turgeon has never been known as a scoring wizard since he began playing in the college ranks. His career highs are 10-point efforts against Wichita State in 1985-86 and against Oklahoma in 1983-84.

This year Turgeon is keeping consistent with his past three seasons averaging 4.9 points and 2.8 assists per season. But Brown has always been a Turgeon fan.

"He's meant so much to the program. It goes without saying how freshman record of 138 assists. In proud I am of what he's accomplished," Brown said. "The nice thing about him is that he's Even before this season concludes, rumors have been circulating that Turgeon will take a coaching position at North Carolina or North Carolina State. He was quick to dispel the rumors, saying he plans on taking a graduate assistant position under

K-State will attempt to halt Kansas, Allen Field House hex scoring list, leads the nation's junior

Let's tune in to the latest episode of "Kansas and K-State at the Movies" as both men's basketball teams spend part of Wednesday watching game films.

K-State, 17-7 overall and 7-4 in the Big Eight Conference, probably viewed its version of "Rocky."

Meanwhile, K-State hasn't won against KU in its last nine attempts and hasn't won in Lawrence since 1983. But the Allen Field House hex will affect the outcome. "Teams can't be winners if they dwell on previous wins or losses. Of course we were glad we won the last one, but it's over now and doesn't class in career field goal percentage and rebounds, and is third in the NCAA ranks in field goal percentage. Can Manning be stopped?

'It's hard to do. No one else has been able to do it," Kruger said. "But we need to try to slow him up just a little bit.

The 'Hawks also have the services of second-team, All-Big Eight guard Cedric Hunter who hit for 22 points against the Wildcats. Hunter has been battling an injury and is listed as questionable for tonight.

The big surprise this season has been the play of freshman starter Kevin Pritchard (9.9 points per game), and rookie reserves Jeff Gueldner and Keith Harris.

Their performance - and KU's overall record after non-conference games against the likes of Temple, Wichita State, Ohio State, Pittsburgh, Notre Dame and Louisville has Brown in awe.

"Obviously Cedric and Danny have helped out tremendously, but freshman are freshman," Brown said. "With Archie Marshall's (loss because of knee) injury and the three starters we lost, no, I wouldn't have thought we'd be this far along. NOTES: Brown is 9-0 against the TOPEKA — Controversial funding cuts last month to social programs for dependent children, general welfare recipients, foster parents and day care centers would be partially restored under a bill passed Wednesday in the Senate.

The upper chamber voted 40-0 to approve the bill and forward it to the House after Sen. Gus Bogina, R-Lenexa, said quick action was needed to prevent the loss of federal matching funds.

The bill restores $288,449 in funding to welfare programs which lost money in a funding lapse bill enacted the first week of the session.

Programs receiving a return of some of their money include foster care and day care programs, the aid to dependent children program and general assitance program.

When Gov. Mike Hayden called for $60 million in budget cuts last November to prevent a $13 million deficit, his reductions included slashing $13.2 million from the state welfare agency's budget. At that time, it was said $1.2 million would be needed to restore funding in the four key areas.

However, Bogina said caseload reductions and smaller than expected cash grants resulted in massive savings which allowed the state to return the funds for dependent children and general assistance retroactive to early January when the lapse bill passed. Foster care and day care funding would simply be picked up at original levels, rather than retroactively restored.

"This is not any smoke, these are the actual costs," Bogina said. "I said I'd be the first one to restore the cuts because I didn't like them anymore than anyone else.

'There is a sense of urgency because we need to get this bill signed by the governor by March 15 to be assured we don't lose any federal matching funds.

Sen. Nancy Parrish, D-Topeka, challenged Bogina's claim of reductions in caseload, saying it's her impression there are more children in need of care than ever. She asked if policies for placing children had been changed to reduce the load on foster group homes.

The cuts in the welfare were made in January to avoid a $13 million state treasury deficit June 30. At the time, some lawmakers, especially Democrats, complained bitterly about the welfare cuts.

Other bills which unanimously passed the Senate Wednesday and advanced to the House would:

-Cut the pay of each of the 165 members of the Legislature by $6 per day in a symbolic gesture of fiscal restraint during the state's budget

During the 90-day legislative session, the 40 senators and 125 representatives each are paid $54 daily in salary and $65 per day for expenses. During the remainder of the year, from April to December, members of the Legislature are paid $600 per month.

The $6 per day cut will save $101,970 for the final six months of the fiscal year, which ends June 30. -Make it illegal to stand on university property and sell tickets for regent university special events such as basketball games, concerts and plays - for more than their face value.

The bill is designed primarily to allow university officials to run off ticket scalpers who currently hover around the ticket windows and doors of athletic arenas and stadiums

Committee endorses release of student fees

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - The House Appropriations Committee voted Wednesday to endorse a portion of Gov. Mike Hayden's plan to release excess student fees state universities have received as a result of larger than expected enrollments.

The committee, considering issues affecting the entire state university system, also partly supported Hayden's requested increases for faculty and employee salaries and recommended that the State Board of Regents increase out-of-state tui-

The committee voted 11-9 to support releasing 50 percent of the revenues resulting from the additional university students during the state's current operating year, or about $748,000. Hayden had recommended releasing 75 percent of the revenues, or about $1.1 million.

Rep. Bob Ott, R-Salina, proposed the 50 percent release but Rep. John Solbach, D-Lawrence, told the panel he favored Hayden's plan for a 75 percent release.

"If we don't release these fees, we merely compound the problem at state universities," Solbach said. "I don't think the governor is being overindulgent in his recommendations."

"The Legislature has a long history of not granting fee release, he said. "This is an improvement."

The committee also voted against Hayden's recommendation for an additional release of $635,612 in fees to the University of Kansas during the operating year that begins July 1. Committee members said they wanted to see the extent of KU's projected enrollment increase this fall before releasing more money.

The committee voted to recommend that the regents impose a "substantial" increase in out-ofstate tuition rates. The regents determine tuition rates for state universities each year.

"I think the regents will know what we mean by substantial," said Rep. Rochelle Chronister, R-Neodesha, the proposal's sponsor.

The committee endorsed Hayden's recommendation to increase faculty salaries by 2.5 percent but rejected a 1 percent increase in faculty retirement benefits the Republican governor has proposed.

The budget panel also voted to support Hayden's recommended 2.5 percent increase for classified employees and a 2 percent base increase in the other operating expenditures at state universities.

Official reviews arms shipment controversy

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The former chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said Thursday he believes President Reagan gave advance approval to an Israeli arms shipment to Iran in August 1985, and "ought to stick with" that story he reportedly once told investigators but later retracted.

Sen. David Durenberger, R-Minn., also said embattled White House

Chief of Staff Donald Regan was "just making problems" with some of his actions in the unfolding Iran-Contra controversy.

Meanwhile, members of the presidential review board on the affair conducted a hospital-room interview with former National Security Adviser Robert C. McFarlane.

And inside the White House, spokesman Marlin Fitzwater announced that Reagan stands ready to veto any legislation halting aid to the Nicaraguan government. The Democratic-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee approved such a bill on Wednesday, and Reagan's spokesman said the intent of the legislation "is simply to abandon all Nicaraguans struggling to bring democracy to their country.

Congress, meanwhile, Secretary of State George Shultz offered no response when Rep. Robert Contra rebels fighting the Torricelli, D-N.J., told him during a hearing that U.S.-provided weapons were having a "dramatic" impact in Iran's favor in its war with Iraq.

Torricelli, just back from a trip to Iraq, said, "The security of our country and of the entire western world is very much at issue today. There is a very real threat the Arab world could be united under this (Iranian) fundamentalist revolution," the congressman said. In another development in the widening investigation into the Iran-Contra controversy, visiting Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said in an interview that Israel would provide "necessary information" to congressional committees conducting their own review.

But he said his government would resist any attempt to force Israeli officials to testify about the country's participation in arranging seven U.S. weapons shipments.

Reagan himself said nothing during the day to reporters on the continuing investigation into the secret sale of arms to Iran and apparent diversion of profits to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua. He has repeatedly defended the arms sales, but said he knew nothing of the alleged diversion of funds until Attorney General Edwin Meese III unearthed evidence in November of last year.

On Wednesday, Reagan said

Lukas says U.S. social class 'dirty little secret'

By CHRIS DOLL Staff Writer

The social class problem is "America's dirty little secret" - a problem that can be solved only when all the classes shoulder the burden of responsibility, said author J. Anthony Lukas at the All-University Convocation Thursday.

"We can no longer afford to have the burden borne by the weakest among us," said Lukas, winner of a 1968 Pulitzer Prize. "It must be also be shouldered by the comfortable and privileged.'

Lukas spoke to about 100 people in McCain Auditorium on the topic "In Search of a Common Ground: Race and Class in America.

Lukas cited Boston, where most of the white population is of Irish descent, to illustrate how class problems are the results of a "family feud" started after World War II.

After the war, some Irish families used Veterans Administation loans to purchase homes in the suburbs and start businesses. They eventually became wealthy and powerful families like the Kennedy clan, Lukas said.

Other Irish families were not so fortunate.

"They were left behind in shabby neighborhoods where they were pitted against blacks and Hispanics for scarce jobs and opportunities which once seemed their birthright," he said.

As the middle clase became more affluent and educated, Lukas said their ideas of political morality and social justice changed from when they lived in the inner city, and this is where the class problem started.

'We, the comfortable and welleducated, tend to sit on one side and condemn the poor and vulnerable on the other side for not living up to our high standards," he said.

If these problems are to be addressed, the classes must "build coalitions, seek mutual self-interest and find a swatch of common ground to build a just, humane country," he said.

In 1965, the class problem was exacerbated when Boston enacted the first and only voluntary desegregation policy in the United States, Lukas said.

Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist J. Anthony Lukas responds to a question about racism in America at a press conference Thursday in the Union.

"Both sides felt like they were betrayed and stabbed in the back," Lukus said. "Our deepest antipathies are reserved for our own kinds - those who were supposed to stand by us no matter what."

Violence against blacks by inner city whites probably was not entirely racist, he said.

'The blacks were used as the scapegoats of a terrible rage intended for others - the Irish not affected by desegregation." The desegration law deemed schools with enrollments of more than 50 percent black students "unbalanced" and in need of segregation. But schools having all-white students were not affected, he said. This included suburban schools where wealthy families sent their children.

Lukas, delivering the fourth University Convocation this year, said all classes must solve the social class problem in America.

"It nakedly portrayed the clase bias," Lukas said. "It placed the burden of integration on the poor whites and blacks of the inner city and exempted the white suburbia.

"Time and again, social science research has shown it is not enough to put an economically deprived, illprepared white child by an economically deprived, illprepared black child," he said. "One must integrate by social class as well as race if a quality educa-

Judge gives sentence to freshman

By The Collegian Staff

Brent W. Nordhus, freshman in agriculture, pleaded guilty at the Riley County Courthouse Wednesday to three counts of criminal damage to property in connection with the Aggieville disturbance on Oct. 18, Nordhus was arrested during the disturbance, however, he was not attending the University at the time. According to court records, he was charged with three counts of felonies, which were amended to misdemeanors.

Nordhus was sentenced on one count to pay $88 in court costs, $550 in restitution costs and a jail sentence of six months. On the second and third counts, ne months in jail each.

Nordhus was granted an immediate probation of two years. As a condition of his probation, Nordhus must serve a night jail term in the Riley County Jail and complete Alcohol Information School. Nordhus said he will begin serving his jail term Sunday, continuing for 30 nights.

In addition, he is required to pay the two fines. When asked about his sentence, Nordhus said, "I suppose it was Ten people were arrested during the disturbance, including one K-State student and three University of Kansas students.

Troy W. Coats, freshman in predesign professions, was sentenced on Nov. 18, 1986, to a diversion agreement for one year. The agreement states that the individual must stay out of trouble, pay a fine and diversion costs. After the KU-K-State football game on Oct. 18, 4,000-6,000 people lined the streets of Aggieville. Bricks, bottles, cans and cups were thrown, breaking many store windows and causing injuries. A car was burned and a gaseous substance resembling tear gas was thrown into the crowded streets.

Arrests were made on charges of felony burglary, felony damage to property and several misdemeanors.

Gas tax possible

officials favor new state highways

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - A bill that would build 740 miles of new state highways is vital to the future economic development of the state, spokesmen for Sedgwick and Shawnee counties told lawmakers Thursday.

The officials and lobbyists appeared in support of the measure, which would finance the estimated $772 million cost of the new highways by increasing the state's gasoline tax from 11 cents to 16 cents per gallon. The proposal lists possible projects in southeast Kansas, Topeka, Wichita and west

However, the witnesses came before the Senate Transportation and Utilities Committee mainly to lobby for highways in their

"Without a first-class road system, our continued economic health will deteriorate," said Tom Pickford, Shawnee County director of public works. "The Romans conquered the world because they built the finest roads known to man."

Pickford and Topeka Mayor Doug Wright told the committee they are backing the bill because it includes plans to built two turn lanes that were left off of the interchange of Interstates 70 and 470 in west Topeka. Completion of the interchange is necessary because of plans for retail growth near the area, they said.

The two officials said a mall, two other shopping centers and a large Wal-Mart retail store will open in the area within one mile of the interchange in the next 15 months.

Without the proposed turn lanes, retail growth would be stifled, said Kurt Heinz, a spokesman for the Shawnee County Highway

"This bill is an excellent effort for positioning Kansas for additional growth," Heinz

And Willie Martin, a lobbyist for the Sedgwick County Commission, urged support for a bypass around northeast Wichita. Martin said the bypass would spur growth in Wichita, just as other possible highway projects included in the bill would create growth

"Southeast and south-central Kansas, including Wichita and Sedgwick County, are at an economic crossroads," Martin said.

However, others raised concerns about financing the projects through an increase in the state gas tax. Gov. Mike Hayden has said he wants cities and counties to participate in financing such projects, and he has named a commission to study possible new or improved highway routes in Kansas and ways to pay for them.

Paul Fleener, lobbyist for the Kansas Farm Bureau, said the agriculture industry needs good roads to survive. However, he expressed reservations about the gas tax in-

'Farmers and ranchers are not before you today clamoring for a 5-cent motor fuel tax increase, but we will pay our share," Fleener

Ron Calbert, a lobbyist for the United Transportation Union, said the workers his group represents are strongly opposed to any gas tax increase.

Aggieville bar to change door admittance policies

By JUDY GOLDBERG Staff Writer

The good news: The line leading to Brother's Tavern should be shorter starting today. The bad news: Those born after July 1, 1966, will no longer be admitted.

Max Strunk, part-owner of Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St., said he decided to stop admitting students under the legal beer-drinking age because it was difficult to keep them from obtaining alcohol "It's almost impossible to monitor a crowd," he said.

In the past, minors were solely responsible if caught drinking, but now bars in which they are drinking are being penalized as well, Strunk said.

Brother's has been fined more than once, and Strunk said he is no longer willing to accept the wrath he has been receiving from officials at the Riley County Municipal Court.

"I don't agree with the laws anyway, but I've got to abide by them," he said. Strunk attempted to stop minors from drinking by having employees stamp the hands of those old enough to drink before selling them beer. But his policy was not foolproof. Students under the legal drinking age had older friends purchase beer for them, he said.

'If you want to drink, you can drink," said Eric Heitmann, a sophomore in mechanical engineering

Afghan refugees target of bomb

PESHAWAR, Pakistan - A bomb exploded Thursday outside the office of an Afghan guerrilla group, killing 10 people and wounding 62. Angry Pakistanis later attacked Afghan refugees and up to four people were reported killed.

There was no claim of responsibility for the blast, but Afghan guerrillas blamed Soviet and Afghan agents. Many Afghan guerrilla groups have offices in Peshawar, which has been hit by a wave of bombings in the past year.

The bomb, hidden in a truck, exploded outside the military office of Jamiat-i-Islami, one of the main Moslem guerrilla groups fighting Afghanistan's Soviet-backed communist government.

Police said the blast destroyed the office and a nearby school. Witnesses said it knocked down walls and destroyed vehicles, and several passers-by were torn to bits.

Reagan lifts sanctions on Poland

Genetics link Alzheimer's, Down's

WASHINGTON - The genetic defect that causes an inherited form of Alzheimer's disease has been traced to the same chromosome responsible for Down's syndrome, a finding that researchers say suggests the same genes may be involved in both conditions.

Scientists from Harvard Medical School and Massachusetts General Hospital, working with colleagues from other institutions, say their results should help in isolating the culprit Alzheimer's gene and determining what goes wrong.

In addition, the genetic tags used to trace the whereabouts of the gene one day might be used to diagnose inherited Alzheimer's in individuals belonging to families prone to the malady long before any symptoms arise, they said.

There is a possibility that the cause of the inherited Alzheimer's disease is the same gene responsible for proteins which clog the brain of those suffering this condition, they said. Several research groups recently reported finding this protein gene.

Alzheimer's disease is a degenerative condition of unknown origin that results in a buildup of tangled fibers within nerve cells of the brain and scaly plaques in between. The condition normally strikes people over age 60 and robs them of memory, judgment and physical

Board OKs parking garage for KU

TOPEKA - A state Board of Regents committee gave its official blessing Thursday to several construction or renovation projects, including a new, $5 million parking garage at the University of Kansas and the renovation of an old library at Pittsburg State University.

The regents' Facilities Committee unanimously approved the projects, and the regents will consider them Friday. However, approval should be routine, said Warren Corman, regents director of facilities. "There isn't anything controversial about them," Corman said.

The committee voted to allow KU officials to ask the Legislature for permission to build a $5 million parking garage on campus. The officials have not yet selected a site for the garage, which it would hold between 650 and 700 cars, Corman said.

The university wants to use parking fees to pay for the garage, Corman said, and the structure could be built by the end of the year. The committee also approved final plans for the renovation of the Porter Building on the Pittsburg State campus. The structure, built in 1926, was once a library, but the university's art department will occupy the building after it is renovated, Corman said.

Searchers find avalanche victims

BRECKENRIDGE, Colo. - More than 250 mountaineers using long poles to probe the deep snow across an avalanche recovered two more bodies Thursday before suspending their search for at least one more missing skier, authorities said.

All three victims of Wednesday's snow slide were men, and their bodies were found in one area of the steep slope.

With blowing snow and the cold hampering efforts late in the day Thursday, Summit County Sheriff's spokesman Ron Milhorn said the search for the fourth skier would resume at 7 a.m. Friday.

The first body was found Wednesday, less than three hours after the avalanche. The other two were found in 4 to 6 feet of snow Thurs-

Stephan may file liquor suit today

TOPEKA - Attorney General Robert Stephan's chief of staff said Thursday a lawsuit is likely to be filed today to test constitutionality of Kansas' minimum liquor price markup law.

"Our attorneys and those from the Revenue Department are still working on it," Neil Woerman said. "I think you can expect something Friday.'

Stephan has issued a legal opinion declaring the law unconstitutional. He has said he will not prosecute cases even if the state Alcoholic Beverage Control Division - which is in the Revenue Department - cites Kansas retail liquor store dealers for ignoring the law and lowering their prices below the posted minimum prices.

However, Gov. Mike Hayden has said he wants the law enforced until it is determined by the courts to be void or the Legislature acts to change it. That has thrown the ABC into a quandary. The governor tells it to enforce the law, and the attorney general says he won't prosecute any cases the agency develops.

To try to break the impasse, a friendly lawsuit will be filed in U.S. District Court here to determine the law's constitutionality. The U.S. Supreme Court recently struck down a similar law in New York

States can set minimum prices on liquor, but the state must actually participate in the price-setting process, attorneys say. That doesn't happen in Kansas. Wholesale liquor dealers set the minimum prices here, based on their cost, plus a transportation fee and a markup set

College of Education joins Holmes Group

By TODD SCHULTZ Collegian Reporter

K-State has joined the Holmes Group, an association of 92 universities committed to improving teacher preparation, said Jerry Horn, associate dean in the College of Education.

The group originated in 1983, with several deans of education colleges at universities in the Big Ten Conference. The majority of the member institutions are state and land-grant universities.

While the group establishes certain goals toward which universities can work, each institution may use its resources to accomplish these goals in whatever manner it chooses

"Each institution is obligated to work toward these goals, but it is up to each of them how they will do it," he said.

According to a report submitted by the group, its primary goals

-To increase teachers' command of academic subjects and the skills to teach them.

-To distinguish between novice teachers, competent members of the profession and high-level professional leaders.

-To create standards of entry through examinations and educational requirements to assure that competent teachers are entering the profession.

-To link universities to primary and secondary schools. To make schools better places in which teachers can work and

Horn said he believes the goals are fairly general, allowing universities to work toward them with their own ideas. "I suppose in a few years we will look back and see a different outcome than what the Holmes Group originally began with," he said, due to the different ways universities may approach each project.

The group chooses the projects on which it will concentrate from proposals submitted by people in the education community, Horn said.

One proposal is to restructure teaching classifications at local schools into three levels of teachers: instructor, professional teacher and career professional.

Instructors would have a bachelor's degree, which could be in a program other than education, and would present class material. The positions would be temporary because the teachers would eventually work toward a master's degree.

Professional teachers would have a master's degree in education and would oversee the instructors and organize the classes. They and instructors would have direct contact with Career professionals would usually have a doctorate in education or a related area. Their duties would include overseeing professional teachers and helping with instructional planning and curriculum development.

Because schools are controlled by local boards and the state, not the federal government, it would be difficult to reorganize school systems from a national level, Horn said.

"Is this unrealistic optimism that schools will be restructured? Probably. Is it realistic to work toward the goals of the Holmes Group? Certainly. I think we ought to do it as teacher educators and as a University," Horn said.

A second activity of the group is identifying ways of preparing college students for teaching, he

"We (at K-State) will be working with other colleges on campus to look at ways to prepare teachers," Horn said.

A third proposal before the group is to establish boards of certification by which teachers would be certified at a national level. The boards would set standards and review credentials of applicants, Horn said.

Currently, each state has a board to license teachers, but the proposed boards would go beyond what is now required by setting higher standards, he said.

Government issues new drug test laws

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Federal employees ordered to take drug tests will find it hard to doctor urine samples under rules issued Thursday, but also are guaranteed review by a medical officer before any positive result can be reported to a supervisor.

The technical rules, prepared by the Department of Health and Human Services, do not deal with the underlying controversy of whether it is proper to require tests.

But they still drew quick criticism from a union chief and from two members of Congress, one of whom accused the Reagan administration of attacking fundamental privacy rights of federal workers.

Last September, President Reagan ordered drug testing of employees who have sensitive jobs and instructed the department to develop the scientific procedures to be followed.

The Office of Personnel Management issued regulations last November that could make as many as 1.1 million workers subject to testing, although only a fraction of them are likely to be required to sub-

Those government-wide rules were held in abeyance pending the Health and Human Services guidelines, but some agencies - including the FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration - have been testing on their own. They will have 180 days to bring their clinical procedures in line with those set Thursday.

The detailed new rules, designed to ensure that the person being tested is submitting his own fresh urine sample, call for water in the toilet used to contain a blue dye and for the sample's temperature to be taken within four minutes.

Both are to guard against the person submitting a sample diluted with toilet water or one that was smuggled into the testing site. A monitor would be nearby, but would not watch the person give the sample.

The guidelines include elaborate instructions on transportation of samples to make sure they are not mixed up and on the laboratory testing procedures.

For example, any sample that tests negative on initial screening is reported back to the agency as negative. An initial positive must be confirmed positive by a second, more expensive analysis that is generally accepted as nearly 100 percent accurate.

Even then, the report must go initially only to the agency's medical review officer.

At a news conference, Attorney General Edwin Meese III and Office of Personnel Management Director Constance M. Horner said the testing program was aimed at rehabilitating drug users.

Legislature to decide waste dump issue

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Lt. Gov. Jack Walker today warned lawmakers the pressure is on them to decide this legislative session whether to drop out of the Central Interstate Low Level Radioactive Waste Compact.

Walker said Congress has issued a "clear mandate" to the 50 states to decide by Jan. 1, 1988, whether they will build individual waste dumps or join "compacts" with other states and construct regional waste dumps.

"There is a very clear federal mandate to decide by Jan. 1 either to join hands in a compact or go your own way," Walker told a joint meeting of three legislative committees. "This is a very critical decision and it has to be made this session, because of the deadline."

About 90 people packed a Statehouse meeting room as the Energy and Natural Resources Committees from the House and Senate, along with the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, launched hearings on the emotional issue.

Walker said the alternative of dropping out of the compact would mean Kansas would have to build its own waste dump, at a cost of $15 million to $20 million.

"It seems to be politically a no-win situation," Walker said.

Besides Walker's briefing, Raymond Perry, executive director of the waste compact, told lawmakers it appears the five states do not generate enough low-level radioactive waste to make it economical for a private developer to run a waste dump for the compact.

He said the compact may have to subsidize the private developer eventually selected to build and run the

"The developer will bear the cost of the siting plan, but we're looking at joint funding of the venture with the developer," Perry said. "I'll tell you, because of the relatively small amount of waste generated by the members of this compact, private developers are not jumping over hoops to develop a site for us.'

Because of the small amount of waste generated by the compact, Perry said there's an outside chance another state may be willing to contract with the compact to store its waste, eliminating the need for construction of a dump.

'We've made overtures to other compacts and states, and that's still a possibility.'

He also disagreed with Walker's contention that Kansas could be the compact dumping ground "forever." Perry said the first state selected will have the power to force the other members of the compact to agree in writing to take their turns hosting a dump when the first site is full, in about 30 years.

"The first state selected as a host needs to come in, lay down the ground rules and get it in writing that the others will not drop out in the future," Perry said. "Any state which is the host state will have the muscle to do it."

Perry said it was unknown whether a bill before the Legislature to ban burial of low-level radioactive waste would violate terms of the compact, signed in 1982 by Kansas and ratified in 1985 by Congress. However, it could be viewed as a barrier and cause the state to be kicked out of the compact.

"Personally, I would not like to see that bill passed. But if you're going to do it, you must act quickly so the developers are aware of any restric-

The compact is an association of five states -Kansas, Nebraska. Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana - created as a means of finding one central location for a regional radioactive waste dump.

Lawmakers in Nebraska and Arkansas also are considering bills which could lead to them pulling out of the compact, but Perry said he doubts they will pass or lead to the collapse of the agreement. "This is an emotional issue, and this is a natural reaction to an emotional issue," Perry said of the states thinking of dropping out. "It's disturbing to us.

The recent controversy over the compact was sparked by reports an environmental consultant has identified more areas in Kansas as suitable for a disposal facility than any of the other four states.

According to the report, the list of geologically suitable areas for locating the waste dump has been narrowed down to include: 18 counties in Kansas, 10 in Nebraska, two in Arkansas and one in Louisiana. No suitable areas in Oklahoma were

Another source of irritation is that Kansas is one of the smallest producers of waste but the most likely host for a dump.

Travel gives fresh perspective

The day in, day out existence of a college student can become rather frustrating and boring at times. This in spite of the million things clamoring for our attention. But when those clamoring the loudest are the things we are forced to do, rather than things we'd like to do, stress sets in.

When it seems as if we are going absolutely nowhere, except to become lost in the stacks of Farrell or glued to a keyboard or chained to a textbook, what do we do? People have varying means of dealing with stress and with the locked-in feeling that frequently comes with being a student.

One of my favorite means — but one I use the least - of dealing with those locked-in feelings is to travel. Unfortunately, as a poor graduate student, the funds are rarely able to withstand anything but a short trip home.

I love the feeling of thinking I'm actually going somewhere (even if it is just to Mom and Dad's house). It makes me feel free and alive. I can see the light at the end of the tunnel even if I've been cooped up too long.

After anticipating the trip for weeks, and making endless lists on what to take, leave behind or forget, I really enjoy the physical departure. To be on the move, to head in a direction I rarely go in the everyday routine, to have the car packed and ready for a long trip is a great feeling for me.

I usually don't make a lot of lists when I go home. I just throw all the dirty laundry in the basket and toss it into the car. Most of the time it's easier and I usually don't forget anything that way. Any clothing that is.

Last weekend I went to Missouri, to a small town on The Lake of The Ozarks to visit a friend. I have been looking forward to this trip for weeks.

After doing laundry the weekend before, I carefully set aside the clothes I wanted to take - I even pulled out the suitcase and folded the few sweaters to fit. I figured out what I was going to take and which cases I'd

TELLER Collegian Columnist need to pack all my junk. When I go on a somewhat long trip, it's all I can do to keep from taking everything, including the kitchen sink. I don't know what's worse, the anticipation or packing a week in advance.

Anyway, I spent a short period of time every night last week doing more packing or making those lists to see what I was going to forget. Of course, my classes and work didn't cooperate last week. If anything was going to happen this semester, most of it happened last week. So it was probably a good thing I started to pack on Monday while planning to leave Friday afternoon. A few people thought it was kind of funny, packing a week in advance. But I was ready to leave town, I needed to leave town. It was time to GO

The trip takes a little over five hours. Friday was a busy day, but thanks to friends I managed to leave Manhattan by 2:30, which placed me at my destination around 8. I was still anticipating the enjoyable weekend, so the drive wasn't bad at all. The highway driving to Kansas City and then to Sedalia went just fine. The smaller highways from Sedalia to the lake are much more challenging, curves, hills and lots of trees.

I like the challenge of being in territory I've never driven before and going through areas with lots to see. Missouri is like that.

You may not think trees are a challenge, but when you're from Western Kansas, trees can mean the difference between seeing and not seeing. I'm too used to being able to see in every direction and for long distances, see what's coming and then act/react accordingly. You put trees in my way and I tend to have problems figuring out where I'm going and where I am.

I enjoy driving alone for long distances. I'm in control of my destiny, and the feeling of moving, of actually GOING somewhere always puts me in a good mood. I can talk to myself, sing as loud as I want to the radio, be by myself. I always feel better when I'm on the move. The weekend went fairly well. I think anticipation was better than the reality, but that's another story. However, the drive back on Sunday was not my idea of fun. I left the lake around 3:30, so I should have been back in Manhattan by 9 at the latest, right? Wrong. It was 10:15 when I pulled up in front of my apartment. I lost track of the times I had to stop - I stopped for something to drink, something to eat, to stay awake, but most of all to clear the windshield wipers. The ice kept building up. Naturally the worst buildup of ice occurred during the worst part of the drive, the freeway around and through Kansas City. The amount of snow and slush on the road and the traffic didn't help, but the ice on the wipers drove me crazy.

In spite of the problems with the weather, I enjoyed the trip. The drive to the lake was great and although the drive back could have been better, I just like to drive, even in atrocious weather.

It's too bad the bank account won't allow me to use this particular method of working out my frustrations and boredom more often. I have friends and family all over the country I'd love to visit.

Re: "Test may cause students to 'miss out," in the Feb. 9 Collegian. Louis Pigno, head of the mathematics department, claims K-State may be missing out on some of the best mathematical minds in the world simply because of the Test of Spoken English. How can this be when very few students at K-State have the bilingual ability to understand what these international graduate students are trying to say?

Should it become a requirement at K-State that before you take a class in the mathematics department or any other department with an international teacher that you must first take Arabic 1, Chinese 1 or any other modern language? We feel K-State exists to educate its students and not to frustrate them and force them to be taught with a level of English that would be considered poor for a 3-year-old.

Civil disobedience

We feel compelled to comment on a letter regarding the resentment in the community of Concordia at the actions of the nuns in publicly harboring and aiding illegal aliens from Central America in open violation of the immigration laws. Veronica Wilson, in the Feb. 11 Collegian, sympathized with the refugees and indicated that less overt methods would be acceptable but standing up to federal authority is not.

The real problem is the hypocrisy in Concordia where the people do not have the guts to stand up to the laws or policies they regard as immoral in a society that guarantees them much-prized freedoms.

Civil disobedience is one of the cornerstones of nonviolent strategies for bringing about change in democratic societies. It banks on certain decencies, and the object is not to commit a crime but to protest one's dilemma in making a choice between what is right and what happens to be the law. The civil rights movement would have died prematurely if all the silly laws were held to be holy or broken only surreptitiously.

Finally the malaise is much deeper. The reasons for turning ordinary folks into terrified refugees have to do with Washington, D.C., too. The goal has to be to catch the attention of the Great Chief in Washington and help more than the incriminating trickle seeping up north.

For those readers who are not petrified to exercise their rights and agree that policies like aid to terrorists in Nicaragua are wrong, this is a good opportunity to write to Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, who is a key swing vote. An easier method is to pledge an opiniongram to Students In Solidarity with Central America at 539-5189 so that it be delivered for maximum effect as the vote on aid comes up, possibly as early as this week. American pride

After hearing the controversy and watching the first two episodes of "Amerika," I have found another side to the issue that others have seemed to overlook. Coming from a town in Nebraska near where the hometown segments of "Amerika" were filmed, I find it easy to sympathize with the film's characters.

Seeing Soviets in control of places and institutions that I have for my entire life taken for granted has made me think. It is a shame that the phrase "Be thankful they you are an American" has become trite and often ignored. Hopefully, one outcome of "Amerika" will be a rediscovery of this phrase and also putting feeling into it.

Cowboys still alive

Re: John R. LaShelle's letter "Search for cowboys" in the Feb. 16 Collegian.

To say the increased sexual activity in Herington is a result of "the disappearance of cowboys" is ludicrous. For one, cowboys haven't disappeared. I attended at least a dozen rodeos in Kansas and Missouri last summer. If the hundreds of ropers, riders and bulldoggers I saw weren't cowboys, then what were they?

And who works the cattle in many feedlots and ranches in this state if not cowboys? LaShelle also implied that rodeo queens have disappeared. My roommate and I have competed in five queen contests in the last year. The current and past two Miss Rodeo Kansas queens are K-State students or alumni, and we are just 30 miles from Herington.

Even if his basic premise were correct, I fail to see its connection with increased sexual activity. Is he saying because the students don't have someone to chase after or look up to they have sex instead? Or, even more ridiculous - is he saying cowboys don't have sex? If he is, he's wrong

I also don't understand his statement that the students look forward to becoming adults so they can "dress Western." Is that prohibited for adolescents in Herington? I also fail to see the connection between this and sexual activity anyway.

LaShelle's opinions are ridiculous and absurd and I have one question to ask him: Would you know a real cowboy if you saw

In Monday's Collegian, Mark Bogina's letter noted that the recently defeated athletic fee would have provided $190,000 a year to bring 35 out-of-state athletes to campus. He suggested that the money could be better spent on the library, ranked last in the Big Fortunately, the University community can take direct action to alleviate this problem. A student membership in Friends of the Libraries of Kansas State University costs $5. Faculty, staff and the general public can join Friends of the Libraries for $25. The money goes directly to meet library needs. The organization will allocate $5,000 for that purpose this spring.

The money and the opportunity to do volunteer work for the library are not the most valuable reasons for joining Friends of the Library. Should its membership include 1,000 students and 250 faculty, I'll bet my frayed library card that Student Senate would seriously consider a bill to match every dollar provided for athletics with another for the library (every student would benefit), and the big wheels at Anderson Hall and the State Capitol will see to it that K-State has the kind of library this state deserves.

Facilities manager to retire March 1

By LORI LINDSTROM Collegian Reporter

Twenty-six years after she first came to the University searching for a job, Evelyn Hupe will retire March 1 because she "just wants to stay home."

"My job was never dull, it was always changing," said Hupe, who has been assistant general manager in charge of the support service of Physical Facilities for 26 years. "It was a really rewarding career."

Hupe said she came to the campus in 1961 to find a job, heard of an opening in the physical plant facility, applied and got me job. The physical plant employs a large number of campus workers, including custodians and carpenters, and also houses personnel responsible for performing functions such as budgeting money for new buildings and remodeling.

"She did a fine job for the department," said Fred Ferguson, general manager of physical facilities. "We relied on her for a great deal of the coordination with the other departments.

"She was one of the stable stalwarts of the facility," Ferguson said. "We will miss her."

Hupe said she had the responsibilities of the central mail service and the federal contract post office, now located in Dykstra Hall. She was also in charge of the metering service and issuing keys to all the

She was also in charge of clearing the use of University buildings for fund-raising projects or student events such as the all-University Open House.

Hupe also developed a policy that became Chapter 17 of the Business Procedure Manual to specifically define the use of campus facilities and authorize who could use the buildings.

The policy states buildings can only be used for University-related events. It also defines how many staff members are needed to carry out and clean up after an event.

Hupe said she was also in charge of the central clerical functions, including developing class schedules, telephone systems, running the personnel office and writing the "I really miss (working)," Hupe said. "I miss the contact with the people."

Though March 1 marks the official beginning of retirement for Hupe, she has spent most of February on leave at her home near Wamego.

Hupe said retiring in the middle of the semester was a personal choice. She and her husband, Louie, also retired, plan work in their yard and garden. Hupe said she plans to make a flower bed - something she never had time to do before.

Other plans include spending time with grandchildren, feeding birds in her backyard and watching

Alumni pledge dollars; students exceed record

By KRISTI BARANCIK Collegian Reporter

While many people may be hesitant about calling strangers to ask for money, telefunding at K-State raises more funds than any other form of alumni solicitation.

"The College of Human Ecology has finished their schedule, and they hit a new record," said Rusty Andrews, director of communications for the KSU Foundation. Students and faculty from human ecology raised more than $41,000 for their col-

Lanette Meyer, senior in foods and nutrition, was the most successful human ecology caller. She solicited 37 pledges totaling $1,065.

Calling people for money may seem unnatural, but most people find it much easier than they expected, Andrews said.

Each of the eight academic colleges participates in the telefund. Student and faculty volunteers call alumni from their colleges to ask for donations

The telefund, which runs from Feb. 1 to April 9, is in its seventh year. Last year, $400,000 was raised in the University effort.

"We're at a point now where it's going to be difficult to make dramatic increases," Andrews said. However, the colleges are still hoping to exceed last year's record.

"Involvement of the eight colleges is our main priority. We went to them to enlist their participation," Andrews said. K-State leads the Big Eight in the number of annual supporting alumni and exceeds the national telefund average by almost 8 percent. The Foundation makes an effort to accommodate each college by giving them access to the phones on a rotation basis.

"We try to avoid the week before the 15th for the business college since the alumni are often busy with taxes," Andrews said.

In some cases, it is difficult to get volunteers to work the phones. Many students do not realize that the money they raise will remain in their own college, Andrews said.

The deans of each college have unrestricted use of the telefund money, but most of the funds are returned to the students as scholarships, Andrews said.

Volunteers have an added incentive of winning prizes for successful calling efforts. The Foundation solicits gifts from local businesses to encourage telefund success.

State treasurer asked to amend report

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - State Treasurer Joan Finney spent more than $1,900 of taxpayers' money for printing, mailing and television production last year that should have been reported as "in kind" donations to her political campaign, the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission said Thurs-

In addition, a statement from the commission said Finney might need to report even more state tax contributions to her campaign because telephones in her office may have been used for campaign purposes. Meanwhile, the commission ordered Finney's unsuccessful Republican opponent, Larry Montgomery, to report nearly $9,500 worth of goods or services he received from the Kansas Republican Party during the final days of the 1986 general election campaign.

Both candidates were ordered to submit amended campaign finance reports that reflect the additional contributions within 30 days. Finney said she was unsure whether she would comply with the request, but the treasurer of Montgomery's campaign said he already had done so.

A spokeswoman for the commission said neither candidate would face penalties under the state's campaign finance laws if they file an amended report during the required time period. However, Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, told a hastily called news conference that Finney could be charged with misappropriation of state funds, and if she is convicted, the Legislature should begin impeachment proceedings. "There is substantial evidence that Joan Finney has knowingly and poses, namely her re-election campaign," Vidricksen said.

"A state officer whose name has appeared on the ballot 10 times in 14 years cannot reasonably claim ignorance of the election laws as a defense. Finney denied any wrongdoing and defended the communications expenses, saying she has annual promotions for programs her office ad-

"These are part of the functions of my office," Finney said.

She claimed she was being singled out by Republican state officials, who are frustrated by her string of

The commission's statement said Finney used state funds to print 2,500 posters about a month before the general election that were used to advertise the state's unclaimed property fund.

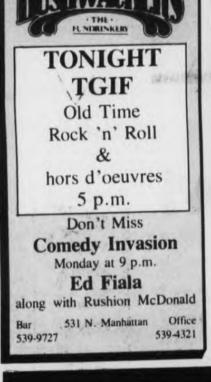

Montgomery and Vidricksen complained at the time that production of the two-color posters, which bear a large picture of Finney, amounted to using state money to finance Finney's re-election campaign.

The state Division of Printing reported it cost $435.15 to produce the posters. In addition, the commission said Finney ordered $812.08 worth of printing to produce 5,300 copies of a 'press release" in late September about a program to offer loans to farmers and small businesses. On Oct. 13, the commission's statement said, the state treasurer's office made a 2,894-piece bulk mailing

"I decided to make a threedimensional picture out of wild seeds," Nesmith said. "As far as I know I am the only one in the country who does this.'

Track and field fans have the opportunity Friday and Saturday to see two of the nation's best college athletes compete in Ahearn Field House.

Kenny Harrison - the No. 1 collegiate triple jumper in the country this year - and Pinkie Suggs, first among Big Eight Conference performers in the women's shot put, will make rare Manhattan appearances at this weekend's K-State Open Indoor Track

"It will give some of our athletes a chance to get another race in before the Big Eight Conference indoor championships (Feb. 27-28 at Lincoln, Neb.)," track coach John Capriotti said.

Field events begin at 5:30 p.m Friday with the men's shot put competition and 6 p.m. at Brandeberry Indoor Complex with the men's high jump competition. Running events start at 9:30 a.m. Saturday.

"This is a low-key, tune-up meet for many of our kids," Capriotti said. "It will be a good chance to see Kenny and Pinkie, two of the best in the nation.'

Harrison will compete in the long jump Friday, attempting to qualify for the NCAA finals. He missed qualifying by one-half inch three weeks ago in Missouri with a leap of 25 feet, 51/2 inches. A qualifying jump would also break the Ahearn Field House record.

Suggs holds the University record in the shot put at 53-81/2, and was defeated for the first time this season Saturday at Nebraska by USC's Diane Clements, a preseason pick to win the NCAA title.

The meet is open to the public and no admission will be charged.

'Cat tennis team looks for 1st win

By The Collegian Staff

To open the spring season with a mark in the loss column was not what the K-State women's tennis team had in mind. But Coach Steve Bietau said the Wildcats now realize how difficult their spring schedule is going to

After five days of practice, following K-State's 9-0 loss to Texas Tech Saturday in Topeka, Bietau said the 'Cats "have in perspective what kind of competition we're up against. You have to gauge yourselves against yourselves and your own progress.

"We had three or four spots last weekend where people played some of the best tennis they've ever played. We've had a good week of practice and I wouldn't say they're down at all," he added.

K-State, 0-1, will look for redemption this weekend in Springfield, Mo. The 'Cats play the first of a three-match series at 8 p.m. Friday against Southwest Missouri State. On Saturday they will test Southwest Baptist and then conclude the series Sunday against Arkansas State.

The 'Cats split with Southwest Missouri State last year, winning in the fall, but losing 8-1 in the spring.

"(Southwest Missouri State) won playing competitively last year, so I expect a close match with them," Bietau said. "We haven't played Southwest Baptist or Arkansas State before, so we really don't know a lot about either team. We know they're not as strong as Texas Tech."

Improvement, not necessarily winning, is K-State's goal this weekend, Bietau said.

K-State's best will highlight Jayhawks soar past K-State, 84-67

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

LAWRENCE - A rematch, yes. A contested rematch, no.

K-State had an opportunity to get revenge on the Kansas Jayhawks Thursday night in Lawrence after suffering an agonizing double-overtime defeat in Ahearn Field House earlier this season.

Revenge, though, wasn't enjoyed as the 'Hawks handed the Wildcats an embarras-ing 84-67 defeat. Kansas moved to 20-7 overall and retained at least a tie for first in the Big Eight Conference race at 9-3.

K-State dropped to 17-8 and 7-5. "This is the best we've played," Kansas coach Larry Brown said. "The kids did a tremendous job. We played well and Danny (Manning) was sensational.

"We played terrible," said K-State's high scorer Mitch Richmond, who had 25 points. "I'm embarrased for myself and the There were many variables in the contest for both squads which on paper didn't show either team holding a definite advantage.

For Kansas, this was the last home game for senior guards Mark Turgeon and Cedric Hunter. This was coupled with the fact that a victory would tie the record for the most consecutive victories at home in Big Eight history at 48.

"I did it at UCLA my first year, started five seniors, and the smallest was about 6-foot-5," Brown said. "It almost got me fired because we really needed that game to get into the NCAA Tournament."

Washington beat the Bruins that night with a long shot at the buzzer, Brown recalled.

"It's not a gimmick to try to fire up the team or the crowd. It's just a sign of appreciation for what the seniors have done,' Brown said. "It's something I've done wherever I've gone and it's something I'll continue doing.

For K-State, it was a chance to end the longest homecourt winning streak alive in college basketball. The odds in favor of the 'Cats looked good with the Jayhawks coming off a defeat at Iowa State in Ames.

But the Wildcats were weak in the early

"They controlled the tempo of the game," K-State senior point guard Lynn Smith said. "They did a good job of scouting us.

From the opening tipoff it was all Kansas, moving ahead after a Mark Pellock layup at the 19:39 mark. This was the closest K-State would get, as the 'Hawks waisted no time opening a 22-4 lead.

It was at this point that K-State made its most impressive run on Kansas.

Spurred by Richmond, the 'Cats went on a 10-0 run in the next 4:39. But they couldn't catch Kansas as a Mark Randall layup spurred the 'Hawks and ended K-State's

The Jayhawks controlled the rest of the half, leading at the midway point, 40-28, off impressive 56 percent shooting from the field to K-State's 33 percent.

All this was done under the guidance of Manning, who's 16 points at the half and 17 in the second stanza made him the game's high scorer with 33 points.

"I thought I had an alright game," Manning said. "I could of played better defen-

Early in the second half, the Wildcats' shooting game came back to life as Norris Coleman sunk a hook shot, pulling them within 10. But nothing could halt Manning.

Manning scored 10 of KU's next 20 points, and from there Kansas rolled to the 17-point win. Ten of the 12 players on KU's roster scored against the 'Cats.

Mark Turgeon made the most of the situation, pulling down a career high six rebounds and equaling his career high by scoring 10 points. "I was a little disappointed with my first half, but I decided in the second half that I was going to give it my all," Turgeon said. "Mark thought he was a shooter out there," said Brown of Turgeon, who was three of 11 from the field. The 'Cats went belly up in the second half, falling 26 points behind — the biggest spread in the game - with 11:52 left. "I thought we were ready," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "Obviously, KU is so much quicker. They'd get all the loose balls and they totally dictated the flow and tempo from the start to finish.

Smith left Allen Field House disappointed, but optimistic.

"I'm getting tired of them beating us," said Smith, who has never won against Kansas in his career. "We might get a shot at them in the Big Eight Tournament. We can beat them, but they are a good team."

Kansas forward Danny Manning (25) hauls down a rebound in front of K-State center Ron Meyer (45) during the second half of the Big Eight game Thursday in Lawrence, Kan. The Jayhawks defeated the Wildcat 84-67 to maintain a share of the Big Eight lead.

SMU penalty falls shy of shutdown

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK - Penalties proposed against Southern Methodist University's football program by the NCAA enforcement staff stop short of the first use of the maximum, two-year "death penalty" shutdown, the school's faculty representative said Thursday.

While the NCAA's infractions committee is not bound by the recommendation and still could impose the maximum penalty on its own, SMU professor Lonnie Kliever said the staff's proposal at a hearing last weekend was the same as the school's.

"We cooperated and were not adversarial," Kliever said. "We discussed and disclosed the infractions that put us at risk with the enforcement people. And we went into the hearing with the staff and the institution agreeing on violations and proposed penalties. Neither the institution nor the enforcement staff went in asking for the death penalty."

Kliever would not say what penalties the school and the enforcement staff proposed.

Under legislation adopted in June 1985, the NCAA may suspend repeat offenders for up to two years, prohibiting competition, recruiting, coaching or scholarships during that period. SMU, the most penalized school in NCAA history, was already under sanction when the current charges surfaced and thus became the first program subject to the most extreme punishment.

David Berst, director of enforcement for the NCAA, would not discuss the case or what penalties the NCAA had asked

With the Big Eight Conference women's basketball race going down to the wire, K-State coach Matilda Mossman is having no trouble getting the first-place Lady Cats motivated for Saturday's game against Kansas. Tip-off time for the game is 2 p.m. at Allen Field House in Lawrence.

"Every game now, the team is up for it, and probably right now we're a little overly so," Mossman said. "We've got to learn to relax a little bit and just go out and do the things that we've done all year long.'

The Lady Cats, 19-6 overall, appear to be doing something right this season. After Nebraska's 87-71 loss Wednesday to Missouri, K-State, 8-4 in the Big Eight, remains tied for the conference lead with Missouri.

Intrastate rival Kansas, 14-12 overall and 7-5, will look to knock K-State down a notch and possibly upset the Lady Cats' chances of winning the conference title.

Sexual awareness program reviews birth control methods

By SHELLY SHAFFER Collegian Reporter

Condoms will not prevent AIDS or the herpes virus, Cindy Burke, health educator at Lafene Student Health Center, said Thursday, during a sexual awareness presentation at Ford Hall.

Burke said research has not concluded whether condoms protect women from these diseases, but they will protect women from chlamydia and gonorrhea, two types of venereal

Despite common misconceptions about protection condoms do and do not provide, Burke said she believes casual sexual encounters are decreasing.

"I think one-night-stand-type relationships have decreased because of the possible consequences," she said. "I also think the best method (of birth control) is the word, 'No." The program in Ford Hall was presented in conjunction with Wellness Month, sponsored by

K-State's residence halls. The concept of Wellness involves the control people have in their lives and making choices that lead to the best possible life, said Nancy Bocklage, Residence Life Program-

"I don't think students are aware that methods of birth control are so easily obtainable at a reasonable price at Lafene," Burke said.

Burke said if a woman is going to be sexually active, she needs to use some form of birth control.

"The birth control pill is the most frequently used method on campus,"

Research has shown the earlier form of the pill contained high amounts of estrogen and progesterone. Burke said now the hormone amounts have been lowered, and the pill is much safer.

The diaphram is a method commonly chosen by women who are less sexually active, Burke said. They usually find this device more convenient than taking the pill every day. She said one drawback to the diaphram is that some women are not comfortable with touching themselves.

The intrauterine device is another method of birth control, but it is not offered at Lafene, Burke said. The IUD may cause Pelvic Inflammatory Disease.

In addition to speaking, Burke presented the slide show, "Young Men's Sexual Responsibility."

Burke will give another presentation, "Sexual Myths and Birth Control," at 7 p.m. Wednesday in the fifth-floor lobby of Haymaker Hall.

State hospitals to face policy changes

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Federal action stripping Winfield State Hospital and Training Center of its certification to accept Medicaid funds could have a big impact on the way the Legislature handles state mental retardation facilities, a key lawmaker said Thursday.

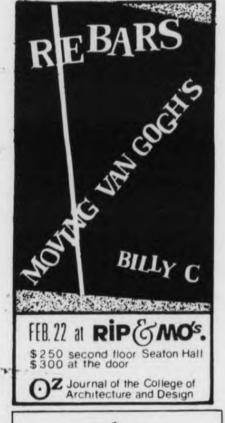

The immediate result will be a scrutinization of mental hospitals across the state, while long-range changes could include a complete change in philosophy from a few, large hospitals to a larger number of small, community-based homes for the mentally retarded.

Sen. Wint Winter, R-Lawrence and chairman of a Senate subcommittee responsible for the budgets of state mental retardation hospitals, said several immediate steps would be taken in the wake of the allegations of patient abuse at Winfield.

'Our No. 1 priority is to ensure the safety of the people at Winfield, regardless of the cost," Winter said. "No. 2, we want to make sure this doesn't happen anywhere else in the state system. Our third priority is to restore federal certification. We definitely have to attack this problem.

Winter and his committee were scheduled to tour Winfield's facilities

Thursday, but postponed the trip in the wake of the stunning news that federal authorities had decertified the hospital.

As if to get the state's attention, the decertification was delivered to the state by federal authorities on a hand-written form, something Robert Harder, director of the state welfare agency, said was un-precedented in his 18 years at the

'We have several options to explore," Winter said. "We want to ask the Legislative Post Auditor to go in there and audit the patient abuse reporting system to determine what changes need to be made. I want to look at all state hospitals to make sure it doesn't happen again. I'd like post audit to make it an emergency priority so they could be there the first of next week."

Winter also is investigating changes in criminal codes to stiffen penalties for failing to report abuse at mental hospitals, to assault a handicapped person or to intimidate someone to prevent reporting of abuse. "I believe the administration at Winfield helped create the environment with their horribly excessive use of part-time employees," Winter said. "These part-timers are largely untrained, they have no pride in the institution or their work, have a high degree of turnover and are basically unprofessional.

"It wasn't the lack of staff, just the wrong kind of staff and administrative governance."

An investigation of the other state hospitals and mental health facilities in Parsons, Norton, Osawatomie, Larned, Topeka and Kansas City will be needed to see if similar staffing patterns are evident.

"We've had a tendency in our society to take our mentally handicapped out of our communities and hide them in two or three big institutions," Winter said. "I've always thought that was wrong. We've learned that the bigger the mental retardation hospitals get, the more of a tendency there is for abuse.

"One of the things we talked about today was dismantling the big mental retardation hospitals. We might want to take our handicapped out of hiding. Is it possible to safely and efficiently administer large mental retardation hospitals? I think this Winfield incident begins to answer that question."

Smaller, community-based institutions scattered across the state would be more manageable and Winter said the smaller scale would offer less opportunities for patient abuse. That would mean a significant scaling down of Winfield, with its estimated 490 patients, and Parsons State Hospital, with its 470 pa-

"There's no question the size of Winfield State Hospital should be reduced," Winter said. "The question is whether its patients should be spread to Parsons, Norton or the Kansas Neurological Institute in Topeka or to private intermediate care facilities. There are going to be changes."

Hungarian orchestra to perform Saturday

By The Collegian Staff

McCain Auditorium will be filled with the sounds of The Franz Liszt Chamber Orchestra from Budapest, Hungary, at 8 p.m. Saturday.

In its first performance at K-State, the orchestra comprises graduates of the Franz Liszt academy in Budapest, including 16 strings and a harpsichord, said Stephen Riggs, McCain director.

The ensemble, founded in 1962, performs without a conductor under the musical direction of violinist Janos Rolla. Jean-Pierre Rampal will be featured on the flute, in addition to a guest flute performance by Alain Marion.

Marion is a native of Marseilles, France, and is a soloist for Radio France, Riggs said. He also teaches at the Conservatoire National Superieur de Musique.

The orchestra regularly tours Europe, Japan and Australia, and first toured the United States in 1974. Since then it has performed in more than 200 North American

The orchestra adopted its name from Hungarian composer Franz Liszt, Riggs said.

Playing some 30 to 35 concerts a year in Hungary, the orchestra has been awarded The Grand Prix of the French Academie du Disque (The Golden Orpheus Award) in Paris on three occasions, he said. They also have recorded more than 100 albums and have twice been awarded The Record of The Year honors in Hungary

When the crowd of about 8,000 realized who was on the platform, they started yelling, "Impeach him. Get rid of the bum. Why don't you put your one-legged son on a bus," and threw tomatoes and eggs at Kennedy, Lukas said.

After Kennedy was safe, he told reporters, "People have strong emotions...and a right to their position." But Lukas said the event meant more than emotions.

"Something had happened that day," he said. "It punctured a notion cherished by the Kennedys, the city and the nation that...the presidency of John Kennedy had finished the assimilation of the Irish into mainstream America.'

Neither side of the feud is necessarily right or wrong, Lukas said. The problem is between two competing values.

"Its racial justice vs. self-determination," he said. "It's the black child's right to a desegregated education vs. the white mother's right to bring up her children as she wants."

Americans have had to deal with this same competition of ideas since its birth. The first issue Americans had to face was to decide if the states or the central government should have more power, he said.

And in 1974, Boston had to deal with the issue again.

"A federal district judge was determined to enforce the constitutional guarantee of equality (for the black students) while a pact of neighborhoods were intent on preserving their own sense of neighborhood."

Iran

Regan would have to decide on his own whether to remain in his post. Durenberger, who presided over a three-week Senate Intelligence Committee review of the Iran-Contras affair last December, was critical of Regan, and said some of his actions have not helped the president. The Minnesota Republican told reporters outside the White House that he and other panel members believed McFarlane when he testified late last year that the president gave advance approval to the Israeli transfer of arms to Iran.

Minors

under the legal drinking age. "We were not serving it to them,"

Strunk said. Terry Hood, a sophomore in mechanical engineering under the drinking age, said he always looked for police when drinking at Brother's.

"You watch what's happening around you," he said.

Hood continued to drink at Brother's even though some of his friends had been ticketed, he said.

"We've seen our friends get busted and the next week we're out there drinking," Hood said.

Another reason Strunk changed the policy was to allow more potential beer buyers entrance to the tavern. He said minors in the bar and in line detained students old enough to drink.

Strunk said he does not believe the measure will cause a decline in business because legal drinkers, discouraged by historically long lines, will now be more apt to go to Brother's.

Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, 1800 Claflin Road, will continue to admit minors, said Todd Miller, assistant manager and junior in finance.

"It (Brother's new policy) ought to help us," he said.

At Charlie's, all patrons' hands are stamped, Miller said.

"A red stamp means you can't drink and green means you can," he

In addition, minors must sign a book before entering as further proof of their age, Miller said. Although the book is not legally binding, it is used as a precautionary measure, said Brad Harrelson, manager of Charlie's.

"(To the police) it looks like we're making an effort to monitor the amount of minors we have in here. "As far as I know, we've got a clean record," Harrelson said.

President insists on verification

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Reagan administration has proposed on-site inspection of Soviet medium-range missile plants to ensure observance of a treaty to eliminate such nuclear weapons from Europe, U.S. arms control director Kenneth N. Adelman said Monday.

In theory, the Soviets have agreed tougher verification measures are essential, Adelman said. But they have not agreed to any specific steps, the U.S. official said in an interview.

Texas town focus of play by MCT cast

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

A little bit of Texas will come to Manhattan this weekend as the Manhattan Civic Theatre presents its February production, "Bourbon and Laundry/Lone Star.'

"Bourbon and Laundry/Lone Star" will be staged at 8 p.m. tonight and Saturday, and Feb. 27-28 in the bsement of the Manhattan City Auditorium.

Directed by Pat Foltz, the production consists of two interrelated one-act plays depicting men and women in a west Texas town during the 1970s, said Pat Weisenburger, editor of the company's Marquee newsletter.

The first act, "Bourbon and Laundry," concerns three ladies who spend their afternoons drinking bourbon and reminiscing about bygone high school days, Weisenburger said. The second act, "Lone Star," is about the women's men, who meet at an outside local bar to drink beer and also reminisce about their conquests and memories of high school days, she said. The characters represent the 'good ol' boys of Texas," Weisenburger said. Their language reflects their obscene nature and different views toward lost days of adolescence. "The characters are struggling to deal with life as they want it to be, as they remember it — not as it is," Weisenburger said. "They are funny, pathetic, irritating and touching.

Country music by Tammy Wynette and Hank Williams Jr., is featured throughout the play.

More Than A Class

Each semester, many students search through their line schedules for a class outside their curriculum that might bring some relevance to their lives. "Theatre for Special Populations" is one such class.

Part of the class, taught by Norman J. "Doc" Fedder, professor of speech, is made up of students in such diverse curriculums a social work, recreation administration, speech pathology and marketing.

The remainder of the roster is filled by Debbie Engstrom's class for the trainable mentally handicapped at Manhattan Middle Drama is the instrument used in Fedder's class to help his students communicate and work through social and personal problems. "The purpose of the course is to develop imagination, self-expressiveness and social relatedness by having these retarded students improvise material from their own lives," Fedder said.

"Theatre for Special Populations" meets at 9:30 a.m. on Tuesday and Thursday in the Purple Masque Theatre. Each Tuesday the TMH students are bused to K-State, where they participate in dramatic activities with Fedder's class.

"What we want the students to do is take the experience from the class out into their fields," said Debra Bettencourt, graduate student in speech and assistant to

The theater experience can serve as therapy for the students by showing them that we all have problems, she said. Through drama the students maximize their strengths and minimize their weaknesses

K-State students in the class also strive to develop these qualities within themselves. "Acting out experiences can be very therapeutic, and everybody grows from it,"

Bettencourt said. Fedder said what one learns from the mentally retarded is transferable to any population, and students realize that these experiences can apply to their field of study.

"Being a marketing major in the college of business, I feel that if I can relate to a mentally retarded junior high student then I can relate to anyone," said Randy Dooling, senior in marketing.

Belle Dawkins, graduate student in elementary education, said, "When you're working with individuals like this, people bring the best out of you. It is really a burden when you don't interact with a real person, from the Georgia Becker, mother of TMH student John Becker, said it is awakening for the college students. At first they might not know what to expect, she said, but what they find are lovable people.

The class also gives K-State students an understanding of a segment of society that they may never have experienced before, Becker said. "One of the greatest benefits the K-State students get is the opportunity to get hands-on experience with handicapped people," Becker said. Betty Kells, mother of TMH student Amy Kells, said the class offers a "real experience" for K-State students.

It benefits the K-State students by "just getting to know them as people," Kells said.

The class shows what the TMH students can do when given the opportunity, Kells said. Becker said, besides enjoyment, her son,

'This is an experiential course. We get as much out of it as (TMH students) do ' - Norman J. Fedder

John, gets "a boost to his self-confidence and social behavior skills." She said it also gives him encouragement to talk more. Fedder said there is no way he could teach students how to work with special children except by allowing them the opportunity to do "This is an experiential course. We get as much out of it as (TMH students) do," he said. "We're all in this together." "This is mainstreaming in its highest stage." Mainstreaming is when special education students and normal students are put into the same class setting together. 'We're all human beings, and we're all the same on that level," he said. Students enroll in the TSP course for various reasons.

"I wanted a class I could enjoy," said Pat Williams, graduate student in horticulture therapy. "This is the first class in my seven years here I can really enjoy.

"This is the only class on campus that teaches interaction from human being to human being," said Deni Good, graduate student in theater.

Whatever the reason for taking the course, the class offers important communication skills that can be applied to all aspects of life.

Interaction among the students plays an important role in the theater for special populations class. Peggy Tipton and Matt Burnau share a laugh at the end of the class.

Fedder uses the end of the class period to talk with Sabrina Buckner and other students to discover what they enjoyed the most about the class.

'Sax Master' mixes talents on new LP

By ANDRE KELLEY Collegian Reviewer

Tenor sax jazz musician Kenny G. is back with his third LP "Duotones," and it's a knock-out. This time, the "saxmaster" had a lot of help from a lot of very talented people, and the album shows that G. knows how to round up top musicians and focus them into a fresh, cohesive effort.

The grammy-nominated LP was produced jointly by Kenny G. and drummer/singer/songwriter Narada Michael Walden. In the past, Walden has worked with the likes of Sister Sledge, Stacey Lattisaw, Janet Jackson and most notably Aretha Franklin on her "Who's Zoomin' Who" and current "Aretha" LPs.

You can even hear the mighty bass playing of Randy (guess which family) Jackson who this past year alone has played on everything from Journey's "Raised on Radio" and Luther Vandross' "Give Me the Reason," to Kenny Loggins' "Vox Humana."

With all this help, plus his own inredible self-taught ability, 'Duotones" is clearly the result of well-integrated production and collaboration.

The LP offers three very impressive vocal cuts. The Jr. Walker classic "What Does It Take To Win Your Love)" is powerfully evived and blown by Ellis Hall. Newcomer Claytoven Richardson is featured on the swaying "You Make Me Believe in Love." And finally, "Soul Train" veteran Lenny Williams takes his time and his turns with wonderful sax solos on the sometimes somber "Don't Make Me Wait for Love."

All three are performed passionately as well as professionally, and (unlike some jazz LPs) the vocalist and the musicians complement one another instead of drowning one another out. In addition to the vocal tracks. the album also includes a wide array of enjoyable and mood-altering jazz numbers.

From his appearances on the Carson and Rivers shows, he in-

Continued from Page 6 cludes the funk-infused "Midnight Motion." Then the band cuts loose and breaks it all the way down with "Slip of the Tongue" where they jam so tough, you can hear the band members chanting in the background. And then there's the semi-classical "Esther," which features a stunning intertwining of tenor sax and synthesized violins both played by G. The best cut, "Songbird," is hyp notically textured and a stand out testament to G.'s ability to take a sax and a mood, like a brush on canvas, and paint virtually anything from feelings to landscapes, while leaving very little out of the picture.

This album will leave no doubt in your mind that Kenny G. truly belongs in the stellar ranks of Grover Washington, Ritenour and Sanborn.

But what "Duotones" does best is that it showcases the old with the new, while holding up Kenny G.'s versatility as both artist and producer. It may easily prove to be the best jazz LP of the year.

Day-care center in debt, officials say

By TERESA TEMME Staff Writer

Although an outside audit is still pending, K-State officials believe the KSU Child Care Cooperative has accumulated a debt exceeding $30,000.

The debt-ridden cooperative turned over all fiscal and managerial responsibilities to the University's housing department last December, at the recommendation of a KSU task force.

Thomas Frith, director of the Department of Housing, said an outside audit of the cooperative will have to be completed in order to show the exact amount the co-op is in the red.

Even while cooperative advisers take measures to alleviate the accumulated debt, Sally Routson, coordinator of Student Activities, said the cooperative has $20,985 left from the $86,000 allocated by Stu-dent Senate to the cooperative on Feb. 13, 1986. This figure does not include any outstanding recent bills, she said. Student Senate allocated the money to meet the cooperative's request to expand its facilities. The allocation allowed an expansion of the cooperative's ability to provide care from 90 to 240 children and enabled care for infants and children to age 13.

Routson explained by working from an endowment the cooperative would not have to use fund-raising efforts for renovations of the facility, but rather would be able to use the funds to lower the service charges for student-parents using the facility.

It will take at least a semester for the facility to break even ... after the facility breaks even, we can later lower rates.'

- Thomas Frith

Frith said the money from Senate cannot be used to pay the debt because it is explicitly allocated for facility renovations.

He said the cooperative will re-main a separate non-profit entity, but it will be a division within the housing department. Neither will the housing department absorb the debt, Frith said, but with financial had an MBA and someone was changes the cooperative will pay its changes the cooperative will pay its

Changes within the co-op include a decrease in salaries for some cooperative employees, the elimination of the bookkeeper's position, renegotiation of food con-tracts and employee meals, and the suspension of current cooperative

The cooperative's former bookkeeper, who wishes to remain anonymous, said the facility has had a succession of four bookkeepers since opening its doors two years ago.

She said she did not believe this was a reason for the cooperative's financial problems, but that a bookkeeper was not what the cooperative needed.

"What they (the cooperative) eded was someone with more MBA (Master of Business Administration) skills, rather than bookkeeping...they needed fiscal and budget plans made out," she

The former bookkeeper said she started as a receptionist for the cooperative, but later filled the bookkeeper's position because she

Under the new arrangement, the cooperative's board of directors will become advisers and Nancy Bolsen, director of the cooperative, will report administrative and fiscal matters to Frith.

"It will take at least a semester for the facility to break even," Frith said, adding he expects it to happen this semester because of the changes being made. "After the facility breaks even, we can later lower (child care) rates."

"We are investigating all economies possible," Frith said.

New rate structure

Bolsen said a new fee structure was part of the recommendations.

"We needed something more equitable. Most of the students were at the lower end of the fee scale (which is based on family income)," she said.

Consequently, a new fee struc-ture for parents with children at the cooperative was implemented Jan. 1. Five types of programs serve dif-

Regents, governor disagree on budget

By CHRIS DOLL Staff Writer

The Kansas State Board of Regents and Gov. Mike Hayden have different ideas for the Regents budgets - a difference amounting to $31.5 million.

The Regents reviewed the 1988 budget request it submitted to the Kansas Legislature Friday at its regular monthly meeting in Topeka.

The Regents budget for the six institutions is $46.2 million, while Hayden asked the Legislature to consider a $14.7 million budget.

The report the Regents reviewed said the increase is necessary to keep Kansas institutions at the same quality level as their peer institutions in other states

Since 1976, the Regents have periodically contrasted Regents schools with "comparable" universities. K-State and the University of Kansas were compared to state universities such as Colorado State University, Iowa State University and Oklahoma State University. The other Regents institutions were compared to schools fitting their similar make-up.

The 1973 analysis showed Kansas schools were funded only 87 percent as much as the other universities.

'We would like to be 15 percent to said Tom 16 percent higher," Ralson, director of resources and financial planning. "There is a relationship between quality and expenditures. These (institutions compared to Regents schools) were not the Michigan States or the Purdues that are known for high-quality educations."

Kansas spent 90 percent as much as the peer schools in 1978, the highest percentage ever. From 1978 to 1983 the percentage of funding fell. and in 1983, Regents schools were hit with a $14 million budget cut, making funding difficult, Ralson said.

"Now we are in the process of picking up some ground, and we're almost back to where we were in '76," Ralson said. "But we're still $48 million behind where we should be for the six universities."

In the 1988 budget, the Regents are asking the Legislature for a 8 percent raise in salaries for "professional" positions, including administrators and professors. Hayden is suggesting a 21/2 percent increase.

Salaries make up two-thirds of the budget. The other portion goes to operational expenses

Committee to quiz North's secretary

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Congressional investigators will question the former personal secretary to Lt. Col. Oliver North who reportedly helped North destroy White House records crucial to the Iran-Contra probe, a member of the Senate committee examining the affair said Sunday.

The new report comes amid denials by White House officials that chief of staff Donald Regan planned to resign following bitter disputes with President Reagan's wife, Nancy, and criticism of his handling of the Iran affair.

The president entertained the nation's governors at a formal White House dinner and during the postdinner reception was asked about Regan's status.

"I'm not going to answer any questions until the Tower commission report," Reagan replied.

The first lady was asked if it was time for Regan to leave and she smiled and replied, "I don't know." She declined to give her reaction to the latest reports that she was feuding with the chief of staff.

rumors that Regan was on his way out - perhaps as early as Monday or after the release of the Tower Commission report on Thursday. "I know of no such plans," White House spokesman Dan Howard said. Dismissing the reports as rumors, Regan's executive assistant Thomas Dawson said, "I don't believe they are true.'

However, Larry Speakes, former White House press secretary, said Regan may resign in the next few days because the controversy over the Iran-Contra affair may be "almost at the unbearable stage" for the chief of staff.

"Don Regan has been the victim of a vicious campaign by the media to get him out of office," Speakes said in Richmond, Va. on Saturday.

"I'm sure he's said, 'Why the heck should I put up with this mess," Speakes told a forum on U.S. problems with Iran, adding: "This is not insider knowledge but based on my understanding of what goes on at the White House. Sen. George Mitchell, D-Maine, a

Administration members defend support fee

By PAT HUND Campus Editor

Two members of the central administration defended the tentative institutional support fee Friday afternoon to student representatives of three agencies being taxed.

In addition, George Miller, vice president of administration and finance, and John Moore, assistant vice president of administration and finance, discussed how future institutional support service charges might be imposed on the various agencies.

Miller showed a breakdown of figures compiled by the central administration to charge the three agencies being represented at Friday's meeting: the Union, Student Publications Inc. and Lafene Student the total revenue generated in fiscal 1986 and will be paid out of the agencies' fiscal 1987 budgets. The support fee charged for a fiscal year will be paid during the next fiscal year, Miller said.

Health Center. The institutional support fee taxes

The following rates have been tentatively approved by the administration, but are still subject to change:

The Union has been assessed a 1.5 percent service charge on the total income accumulated last year, $6,573,637, less interdepartmental sales and office supply store commission, but adding room rentals, commissions and other revenue. The 1.5 percent charge of this adjusted amount, $5,978,396, is $89,676. The administration then subtracted from this amount 40 percent of the salary for Sally Routson, coordinator for Student Activities, which is paid by

The Union had previously been assessed a 3 percent service charge, but that was reduced because the Union pays its own utilities. "They pay their own freight," Miller said.

The total income of Student Publications last year was $740,120. Deducted from this amount is money received through the student activity fee, interest income, a workshop fee and interdepartmental sales. This reduced the total sales and service revenue to $487,988, which makes the net 3 percent institutional support fee $14,640.

Lafene Student Health Center had a total revenue of $2,089,366 in fiscal 1986. However, all but $473,920 of this amount was subtracted through student health fees and interdepartmental sales. Lafene was assessed a 3 percent charge of "These are preliminary figures; I have not approved any of them yet," Miller said Moore said five areas relating to the University were analyzed to determine the amount of the support fee that should be assessed to the agencies. Research, instruction, extension service, continuing education and the experiment stations are all assessed an average institutional support fee of 3 percent.

Moore said the five areas are currently paying a fee between 2.8 percent to 4.9 percent of money received for institutional support.

He said a 3 percent rate was determined to be reasonable based on the University's costing principles. Even if a new set of costing principles was developed, the proposed rate would probably vary little from the 3 percent assessment, Moore said.

"That was the basis that we used for suggesting a 3 percent institutional support fee," Moore said.

Support services

Miller separated institutional support services into five specific categories:

Executive management, including institutional support services provided by the president, provost and University vice presidents.

Financial management and operations, including the University controller, cashiering, student accounts payroll and budgets. - Logistical services, including personnel, public safety and purchasing. Public safety includes campus police department, hazardous waste and inspections, Moore said. - Administrative computing - Public relations, including services provided through University Relations. Steven Johnson, junior in animal sciences and student body president who represented the three agencies, said some of these services are not used equally by the agencies.

Miller said while some elements of institutional support may not be used by the agencies, the 3 percent fee was used for simplification purposes because the University did not have enough time to do a more extensive

While the University does provide these services, student representatives argued that they also provide services to the University that the central administration has not

Grenades wound 12 in Jerusalem

JERUSALEM - A hand grenade attack wounded 12 Israeli border guards and five Palestinian by-standers Sunday in a crowded street outside the Old City of Jerusalem and sent hundreds of foreign tourists and shoppers running for cover. Four Palestinian guerrilla groups claimed responsibility.

Dozens of green-uniformed border patrol guards immediately converged on the area of stone-paved streets near the Damascus Gate and began searches. They detained more than 70 Arabs at gunpoint. The grenade exploded 50 yards from the gate, one of seven entrances to the ancient walled city.

Police said two victims were in serious condition. Ambulances sped to the site and bloody bandages littered the sidewalk where medics gave first aid.

Jerusalem police spokesman Rafi Levy said the grenade apparently was thrown at a border guard police patrol as the paramilitary guards changed shifts at 2:15 p.m. Israel Radio said the grenade was

Reardon's latest surgery successful

KANSAS CITY, Kan. - Mayor Jack Reardon's new heart was functioning normally Sunday after doctors operated this weekend to remove excess fluid around his heart, a hospital spokesman said.

"Mayor Reardon is doing well today after a restful night," said Mary Harrison, a spokesman at the University of Kansas Medical Center. "Since coming out of surgery Saturday afternoon, his vital signs have been normal and he is experiencing no problems. Heart function is excellent "

She said the mayor remained in critical condition in the intensive care unit. He continued to breathe with the aid of a respirator, which officials described as standard procedure, Harrison said.

Dr. Jon Moran, Reardon's physician, said the fluid removed during Saturday's surgery was old blood that mostly likely seeped into his chest after draina Reardon was not bleeding internally.

Residents bulldoze 'Berlin Wall'

NEW ORLEANS - The city has bulldozed barriers dividing a mostly black New Orleans neighborhood from a predominantly white suburb, but a leader of the suburban government said the barricade would be rebuilt on Monday.

The Jefferson Parish Council voted to erect the barriers at the behest of suburban residents who said they believe New Orleans people were driving into their neighborhood after dark, burglarizing homes and assaulting people.

Black city residents called the barriers - strips of steel attached to thick wooden posts - "The Berlin Wall."

Bob Evans, chairman of the Jefferson Parish Council, said Sunday the city had no right to tear down the barricades since they were built on the Jefferson side of the border with New Orleans, which is Orleans Parish.

"He can't lock my people in," said Mayor Sidney Barthelemy, who ordered the city work crews to tear the barriers down Saturday. "We are going to have to go to court," Barthelemy said in a telephone interview. "He can't block a state highway.

Warhol, Susskind die in New York

NEW YORK - Andy Warhol, the pale prince of Pop Art who turned images of soup cans and superstars into museum pieces, died Sunday of a heart attack.

Warhol, who was believed to be 58, died at New York Hospital a day after undergoing gall bladder surgery. A cardiac arrest team worked for an hour to save him.

Slender, pallid and soft-spoken, instantly recognizable in his blond wig, Warhol abandoned a successful career as a commercial illustrator in the 1950s to gain worldwide fame as the principal exponent of the Pop Art movement.

He won fame in the early 1960s by producing repeated silk-screen images of commonplace items such as Campbell's soup cans, and went on to establish himself as the emotionless recorder of the im-

Local manufacturing plant has fashion market all sewn up

By KIM GREER Collegian Reporter

Technically, Manhattan could be called one of the international centers of fashion.

The McCall Pattern Co., 615 Mc-Call Road, is the only manufacturer of McCall patterns in the world.

In addition to the United States, McCall distributes patterns to locations in Australia, Canada and the United Kingdom, said Marcia Fransupervisor employment/equal-employment opportunities at McCall and 1982 K-State graduate.

Some corporate offices and all designing offices are located in New York City. Francke said once a design has been approved in New York, the design offices send a film of the pattern to Manhattan.

After the film arrives, workers transfer the pattern images onto metal plates. Patterns are transferred onto tissue using the offset printing method, similar to newspaper

A designer in New York begins with an idea and creates a sketch. After going to a fabric library to determine what type of fabric is appropriate for the design, it begins to take on a physical shape.

The designer uses a mannequin and muslin to develop a prototype of the design. For women, a size 10 is usually made first, because designers consider this the universal

When the designer gets the prototype to look like the sketch, the muslin version is taken apart so a pattern can be made and photographed. This is also when grading, the process of making different pattern sizes, takes place.

Sketch artists and photographers are also active in these stages of development because the pages of pattern catalogs are designed in New York. The catalog developers put the catalog together using photographs of models and artists' sketches. Pages of the catalog are printed by an outside printer.

New York sends the pages to Manhattan to be put together and sent to dealers and distributors, along with pattern order forms.

Not all of the work in Manhattan is done by machines. Some patterns are either too large to be machinefolded or have too many small pieces for the folding machine to handle. When this occurs, people are used to hand fold the patterns.

June Noe, supervisor and trainer of 13 hand folders, said a hand folder must have dexterity.

"You must be good with your hands and fast," she said. Noe said her job requires her to "be a good delegator.'

Noe, an employee of the company for more than 20 years, supervises the hand folders, keeps things going in the proper sequence and handles paperwork.

To become a hand folder, an entrylevel job, workers must complete 16 weeks of training. By the end of the training period, a worker must be 85 percent efficient, Noe said.

The method for developing efficiency figures begins with an outside consultant. This consultant determines how much time each hand movement in the hand-folding process should take.

Each pattern has a specific number of movements to it. The time allowed for each movement is totaled and multiplied by 1,200 - the number of patterns in each bundle a worker receives. This tells the worker how much time is allowed to fold and package the allotted pattern

Noe said none of McCall's hand folders operate at lower than 100 percent. The workers' wages are computed by the number of patterns they

Carla McCormick, one of 13 hand folders at McCall Pattern Company, folds a pattern before stuffing it into its package. Hand folders at McCall must work fold and package. "The faster they are, the more they make," Noe said. McCall has two major competitors. Simplicity and Butterick/Vogue. As a way to compete with rival companies, McCall offers many stores a "trunk showing." Stores can give a fashion show using

McCall would also be interested in letting a club or an organization use the show as a fund-raising event,

YOU choose to work on.

Francke said.

McCall also has "big-name" patterns, Francke said, such as the Dynasty Collection and the Brooke Shields pattern line. It is also developing patterns for toys and crafts. She said the E.T. Halloween costume pattern was a big seller last year, and a new line of dolls known as Puffalumps seem to be popular.

"If it looks like it will be a big item, we might promote it with a special display," Francke said. Most dealers get a special display unit, especially for Halloween and Christmas pat-

However, McCall sells more than sewing patterns. Patterns for machine-knitted and hand-knitted products, and special product lines, such as scissors and other sewing items, are also marketed. In addition, McCall greeting cards are now on display in many fabric stores. The market for sewing patterns has decreased, but McCall's market share has increased, Francke said.

"We're getting a bigger piece of a smaller pie," she said, attributing the shrinking market to changes in women's lifestyles.

"More women are working - they have less time to sew," Francke said. "Another thing that has hurt (McCall) is the decline of traditional home ec and sewing courses.'

Despite the market decline, Mc-Call has managed to keep its employment statistics stable. The Manhattan company currently employs 328 peopl, 258 of which are hourly workers. Francke said 30 percent of the hourly workers have been with McCall for more than 15 years, while

Soviets warn of future nuclear weapons tests

Humanities 'under siege' at University

In case you haven't noticed, the humanities at K-State are under siege and are about to take a giant step backward. There are many reasons for this. One of them may be that a kind of smugness or inertia can set in among those of us in the humanities who do not often have to defend our very reason for being. Another may be, I suspect, that many in the University, including some faculty, just do not know what we do and tend to think of scholarly reasearch and graduate work in the humanities as a mere luxury at a school whose "mission" lies elsewhere. If there were extra money, well, that would be great. But if we have to cut, well, we're sorry but at least we'll be sure our students get some kind of "exposure" to culture. To help counter this philosophy of being second-rate, it takes some time to defend one's existence and explain what one does for a living, but I think now it is now time, since the erosion of excellence in the humanities environment at K-State has just begun.

The occasion of my reflections is the educational residency of London actors which concluded recently, and I feel I owe to those who have asked me if it will be repeated some explanation why I feel it is less likely. From reactions of faculty, students, community and the media throughout the state, I conclude that the event was a first-rate success. As a Shakespearean scholar, I naturally found it immensely rewarding, from working with the actors and a visiting scholar in classes and seminars to seeing a brilliant and fun production of "The Tempest" - certainly one of the finest Shakespearean performances I have seen anywhere.

For the average reader of this column, it would of course be very tedious to read of all the work put into the project by speech Professor Lew Shelton and myself, or to read about how unpaid labor is provided by the University and community when the state offers a "matching grant" to give money for this project, or how, in some cases, there is no salary incentive or benefit for those involved. It might be even more tedious to read a bitter complaint that while this project was being developed over the last 11/2 years, the Board of Regents was preparing to drop a graduate program in my field, a decision disregarding quality, the recent rejuvenation of the program, increased needs and applications to the program and real financial savings. The "timelessness" of Shakespeare's "The Tempest" applies here, too: The story tells of a duke who lost his political realm by being "rapt" in his books and secret studies

Instead of such laments, however, I want to tell how a climate of advanced work in the humanities is essential for the sort of program we experienced with the actors' residency. The major grant supporting this event came from the Kansas Committee for the Humanities. If you are uninformed, you might well lump together "humanities" with all cultural events and performances, but the distinction is important since humanities events emphasize interpretation, the activity embodied in scholarly work. In fact, the main reason for the residency was a seminar for high school and college teachers on "Shakespeare's Text Through Performance." To create this seminar, and therefore to justify bringing the actors here, it is necessary in my line of work to become immersed in interpretive debate and discussion about Shakespeare and this is done at scholarly conferences (where I first learned of the residency program) and in scholarly writing (relying upon our library's financial ability to make readily available new journals and books). In this discussion, new ap-- such as feminist, psychoanalytic, political and performancecriticism - continually vivify our talk about Shakespeare. All this high-level talk, which I admit might sound incomprehensible at times to you as an outsider, is crucial. One of its byproducts was a first-rate week of "culture." The bottom line of success is more talk about Shakespeare by the whole community.

A number of faculty from the "first-rate" Kansas university applied to get into the seminar, unaware perhaps that humanities were no longer considered a "priority" at K-State. If our "mission," with respect to the humanities, is defined as merely to provide a few undergraduates with any taste of culture, then the level of excellence of the humanities will be that of most junior colleges and many high schools.

I think it would be far better to adopt the land-grant ideal as embodied at Cornell University where the College of Business invests in artworks and where the College of Agriculture hires anthropologists. I realize that financial priorities may have to be set. But they do not have to be the same as educational priorities, and we should look to other solutions than axing or undermining the "low priority" programs. If we are to have museums, they will lose their excellence if we do not try to improve our community of people to talk about the works housed in them and to provide high-level and sustained discussion. I think that means scholarly and graduate work. But at all events, the mediocritization of the humanities is a threat. As we "prioritize," we risk making a self-fulfilling prophecy out of our priorities.

In this way, we help the state to fulfill its description in the Encyclopedia Britannica as a "cultural desert," avoided for that very reason by the high-tech industries we wish would locate here. Why stop at second-rate? If we push our philosophy enough, we can strive for the ranking which our state now holds for rate of public expenditures on the arts: Among the 50 states and six territories, we now rank 51st.

Cut in FACTS funding to hurt state's farmers cut funding in the Farmers chopping out its heart with his Assistance Counseling and Training Service budget harms the program's ability to aid Kansas farmers and undermines efforts to coordinate aid to the state's depressed farm economy.

While Hayden remains committed to extending the FACTS program through 1990, he has proposed elimination of $160,000 for free legal advice and other services, a move officials say would gut the program.

Testifying Wednesday, Secretary of Agriculture Sam Farmers Union. Brownback said legal services for farmers are essential because troubled farms pose difficult issues attorneys avoid.

Hence, "The providing of legal services to distressed farm families is crucial for them to know what their rights are," Brownback said.

Furthermore, Stan Ward, who directs the program centered in Waters Hall, said the pending budget cuts, which would also eliminate three human services personnel, would decrease FACTS' operations.

"If we lose those three human service positions, we will have no capability whatsoever to deal with employment retraining questions and basic family needs such as medical assistance, food, utilities and those kinds of things," Ward said. "And we will have practically no way to deal with crisis intervention calls that come in here - the emotional problems families are dealing with."

Basically what Hayden is doing is keeping a token, political com-

Gov. Mike Hayden's decision to mitment to the service while budgetary ax.

Indeed, Hayden's cuts would keep the program alive only as a symbol.

"The governor has left only enough funding of the FACTS program so it may keep its doors open in name only, and not enough to provide significant beneficial services for the hundreds of Kansas farm families still in need of services provided by the FACTS proram," said Ivan Wyatt, president of Kansas

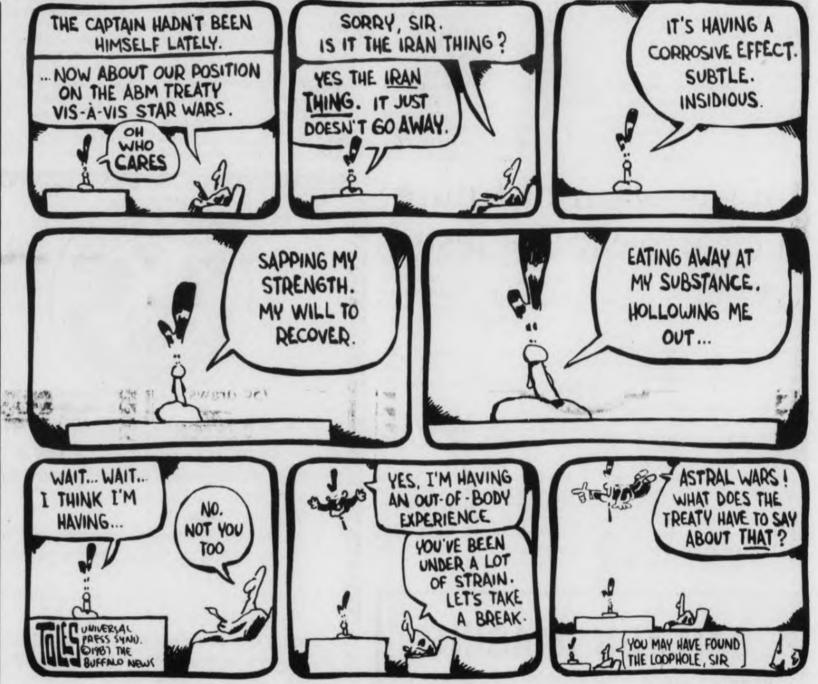

Ironically, the maining of FACTS comes at a time when one state agency, the State Board of Agriculture, is trying to pull local areas out of the farm crisis. Toward this end, the board on Friday introduced a House bill aimed at stimulating economic development in local Kansas communities.

Sapping the life from FACTS undercuts the efforts by the state board because the program acts as a clearinghouse for information needed by farm families and communities.

Deleting this service will hurt innumerable farmers and the state at large, while providing only negligible assistance to the state's budget crisis.

Gov. Hayden and the Legislature need to realize the value of the full range of services provided by FACTS and restore its funding.

It just doesn't make sense to cut off funding to what should be considered the headquarters for a statewide community-based program with the same goals.

Procrastination hard to put off

As with many people, I am behind in my studying thus far into the semester. Chapters of text have gone unread, research papers ignored. But, as I wind down my final episode of this four-year adventure, those facts don't surprise me. As can be testified by people who know me, I often stretch my promises, deadlines and apointments to their fullest extent, coming through just in time to call the situation a success. People who really know me can interpet my statements and translate them into a workable schedule.

A 10:45 appointment means I'll get there on the dawn of 11. A paper due in a 12:30 class will get squeaked in just before 5.

I always plan to get something done ahead of time but it never quite goes in my favor. If by some unforseen reason I manage to get ahead, which is still late by most people's standards, I get worried. A paranoia overcomes me somewhat similar to leaving an easy test knowing I have an "A" and then wondering if I put my name on it. To counteract such problems, I simply spend the needed amount of time thumbing though magazines or gazing at the swimsuit ads in the newspaper, thus returning myself to my schedule.

And during those times when nothing important needs to be done, I don't get much done. However, it would not be good rumor for people to know this, so I have learned the key is to look busy. To fool most of the people, I simply sling my bulging backpack over my shoulder and walk around campus pretending to be on my way to class or to study.

Little do people know, I only sneak into the Union, take a table in the back and indulge in the goodies in my pack. The important factor is loading the backpack in such a manner that it can not be detected that the contents only include three Collegians, a sack lunch, a tape recorder with headphones and my collection of Bloom County comic books.

It is essential not to crinkle the brown paper bag in front of the wrong company or it will be known that I am simply sloughing off time and probably class as well, sneaking from restroom to broom closet, avoiding my editor, in addition to my fraternity scholarship chairman.

I am happy to know I am not the only one dealing with a dilemma. I ran into an old friend in front of Waters Hall the other day.

RON HONIG Collegian Columnist

He was on his way to a quiz and only stopped briefly to chat. He told me he had been spending more time away from his living group recently and that his friends rarely saw him. What bothered him most, though, is the fact that he didn't think they noticed his absence. He said he could probably place a cardboard silhouette of himself in his room and no one would notice. He mentioned that he was attending class regularly and his grades looked good. I informed him that I was almost the opposite and that if I could find an inflatable doll with a mustache that could average a 73 on a marketing exam I would have it made. My friend looked at me strangely and went on his way.

Recently I spent the greater part of an afternoon making up my mind. I was mulling over whether to read a chapter of geography or to partake in a social gathering to which I had been invited. After pondering the question awhile, I realized this type of decision bothered me often

Therefore, I decided to set up a method by which I could quickly make such a decision now and in the future. The method consisted of a formula in which variables could be placed, transacted with constants and from which a conclusion could be reached.

The formula turned out being (hours of sleep the previous night) x (dollars available to spend) x (days until the next test) divided by 100. An answer resulting in a number at or greater than zero means it is all right to go out. However, a score below zero means one cannot afford to participate in the social event either in terms of sleep, money or tests pending. I usually end up on the debit side, therefore I don't go out as much as I used to and I feel bad about it.

I feel I have a social obligation to my friends. An obligation to spend time with them, to call on a rainy afternoon or to send a simple letter. Of course, I am constantly reminded by my mother and adviser that I have an obligation to myself to get an education, not just a diploma. But should a person turn down an offer to go flying, spend a weekend in someone's hometown or even take a Swannie's run?

If my time is going to be wasted anyway, maybe I should make a conscious effort to spend more time with my friends. Maybe I should waste time with them instead of staring at a book alternating paragraphs with saltine crackers and dreaming up my own story between the lines. Why read a paragraph when I can't remember it two seconds later? Instead, as I finish this semester, I think I'm going to consider my "wasted time" as invested time. Time I can spend with friends, reading books, working out or just enjoying college.

Live with defeat

It's really sad that some of our athletic department employees display such bad sportsmanship by continuing to push for a fee that died Feb. 11.

Last Monday, track coach John Capriotti felt "cheated," as he put it. He stated, "It's like winning a race by 2 seconds and having someone tell you that you lost because you needed to win by 4 seconds." Well, Mr. Capriotti, you knew you might have to win by 4 seconds before you started the race.

Your persistence in complaining about this a week later just shows your lack of good sportsmanship. Come on, if you lose a track meet do you persist in complaining about it? It really doesn't matter if you lost by 2 seconds or 20 seconds, the fact remains you

Mr. Capriotti, you can't rerun the race to pick up that extra 2 seconds you needed. The only thing left to do is to grin and bear it: the race is over and you lost. I suggest that the Student Senate and athletic department employees learn to live with that.

Students 'up' for international travel

By DORI WITHERS Collegian Reporter

Two K-State students will leave in May to travel the world, performing with the organization "Up With People."

Rusty Russell, senior in radio and television, and Wendy Holloway, freshman in business administration, are looking forward to a year with the group.

"Up With People" is professionally produced, live entertainment and features both popular and original material performed by a band and singers/dancers.

"I'm graduating in May," Russell said. "What better time than now to travel around the world and meet people from more than 25 countries?

"I think this is a good way to get out on my own and really experience the world," said Holloway, who will stay out of college for one year to tour with the

The two were selected from 9,000 applicants on the basis of threehour personal interviews. The group has 675 members, representing 25 countries and 46 states.

Russell first saw the group perform in Topeka two years ago. "I interviewed mainly because I was curious," he said. Holloway interviewed in June after being encouraged by her family and a friend whose niece was a previous member of the

"I heard about them ("Up With People") three years ago and got really interested after I saw them perform in Texas," Holloway said.

Some of the attributes sought in the interview are maturity, personality, communication abilities

In addition to traveling and meeting people, both said the opportunity will also help in career development.

Holloway is not sure what area of business she wants to pursue, but said she thinks the year will help her make a choice.

"I think it'll help me decide what I'd like to do or at least give me more perspective on what area I'd like to go into," Holloway said.

She said the group interacts with businesses and professionals daily, in addition to staying with host families who expose them to different careers.

Russell is interested in the public relations area of the organization.

"I'm really excited to work in the public relations aspect where a group of three or four go out a month ahead of the group and set up shows, contacts, places to stay (host families) and publicize, Russell said.

He said he expects to learn a lot more from this experience than he would learn as a newly graduated field reporter at a small television station.

The five international casts, each composed of 135 students and staff members from throughout the world, travel approximately 32,000 miles, visiting 80 to 90 cities during the year.

They perform about 200 shows a year. Performances have taken place at the Olympic Games in Munich, four Super Bowl games and in many countries around the Column to discuss questions on stress

By The Collegian Staff

For students, faculty and staff with concerns about mental health, "Dear Sigmund" may have the answers.

Staff at Lafene Mental Health will address questions and concerns about mental stress in a weekly advice column scheduled to start in the Collegian Monday, March 1.

"While most people won't come to a mental health center unless under extreme stress, submitting a letter to a column anonymously may let them obtain advice on problems they struggle with," said Marc said Marc Milhander, clinical psychologist at

"Students struggle with a variety of challenging situations through col-lege," Milhander said. "Academic, financial and social challenges frequently become overwhelming.'

Problems of students coming to Lafene have included depression, anxiety, interpersonal problems, adjustment difficulties, family problems, burn-out, eating disorders, loneliness and isolation, Milhander

Choosing a career track, learning new study habits, conducting research and presenting research papers, and taking tests are all included in the academic challenges, he said.

In addition, changes in a person's lifestyle may be stressful to students, Milhander said.

Lafene's mental health staff consists of two clincial psychologists, two social workers, one psychiatrist and one intern.

Anonymous letters to the Dear-Abby-style column should be less than 300 words in length. Deadline for Monday's column will be noon the previous Wednesday and may be submitted to "Dear Sigmund" in Kedzie 103.

ferent age groups at the cooperative, with the fee scale for each program divided according to family income.

The programs include full-day care, flexi-care (for families needing care on a regular basis but not for a full day), interval care (for families needing care on a less than weekly basis), kindergarten care (planned for the half day), before-school care and after-school care.

Although Bolsen said she believes the cooperative offers rates comparable to those of other independent centers in Manhattan, the rates are quite different.

Currently, the cooperative hourly rates for full-day care range from 90 cents to $1.62, while hourly rates of for-profit centers in Manhattan range from around 75 cents to $1.05.

An article in The Chronicle of Higher Education stated many campus child care centers have fees as high as $3 to make up for a lack of subsidies.

"Child care is somewhat of a problem for all families," Bolsen said. "Quality day care is hard to find. Many families have limited incomes, and child care is a large part of their budgets."

Don McCoy, graduate student in psychology, said the new rate structure greatly affected him and his

"If I wouldn't have been able to get my assistantship again this semester, we would not have been able to afford the cooperative," Mc-

Coy said. McCoy said they would have looked into having their son cared for in a private home if he hadn't received the assistantship. He said they would not try to find another child care center in Manhattan because he felt even another center in Manhattan would have been too expensive for them.

McCoy said he and his wife would have been disappointed if they had not been able to afford the cooperative because they believe it is a quality facility.

"It (the cooperative) is excellent...because he (their son) has learned so much in one year. The teachers seem to really care, and this is important to us. We just feel really comfortable with the cooperative."

Charlie Fahrenholz, research assistant in grain science, said the new rate did not have a great effect on his situation. He said this year his child was put in a program for older children that is less expensive than the program his child was previously

The cooperative has an immediate waiting list of 11, but it is capable of handling more children because it is licensed for 223 and has 170 enrolled

Bolsen said a waiting list is currently maintained in order to open new sections of existing programs. Bolsen said only the most demanded programs have waiting lists.

Many Manhattan for-profit centers have the facilities to handle more children than they currently are licensed to accept, but they choose not to take on more children.

Child care a recruiting tool

A Chronicle of Higher Education article reported good campus child care allows hundreds of female students to attend college each year.

According to a recent Wall Street Journal report, more than 70 percent of women of childbearing age now work, up from 40 percent in 1955. By 1990, 14 million preschool children will be cared for by someone other than a parent - twice today's number.

The article said between 1970 and 1982 the number of women age 25-29 enrolled in college went up 249 percent. The number of women age 30-34 rose 314 percent.

The need for more child care has been rising since the early 1970s when the divorce rate increased and more women began returning to college. Since 1970, the number of campus child care centers has increased almost 90 percent.

The article said many educational institutions have begun to design marketing strategies around the availability of child care. Some institutions are considering the addition of child care service, in part to boost applications.

Ruth Hoeflin, director of the FENIX program, said figures show between 2,500 and 2,800 undergraduate students over 25 attended K-State last year. FENIX is a support program to help students over 25-years-old or older who are returning to academic life.

"I keep stressing to K-State officials the importance of this segment of the student population. Twenty percent of undergraduates are over 25," Hoeflin said.

Bolsen agreed. "I think it is one of the University's real recruiting tools. Quality child care is very important to parents. When they go off to teach, work or class, they want that feeling of comfort. They want to know that their child is well taken care of."

Bolsen said before the cooperative existed, many individuals with children just did not attend college because child care wasn't available.

Maxine Jevons, junior in business administration, said the cooperative allows her to attend K-State.

"The cooperative works out especially well with my situation (attending classes at K-State)," Jevons

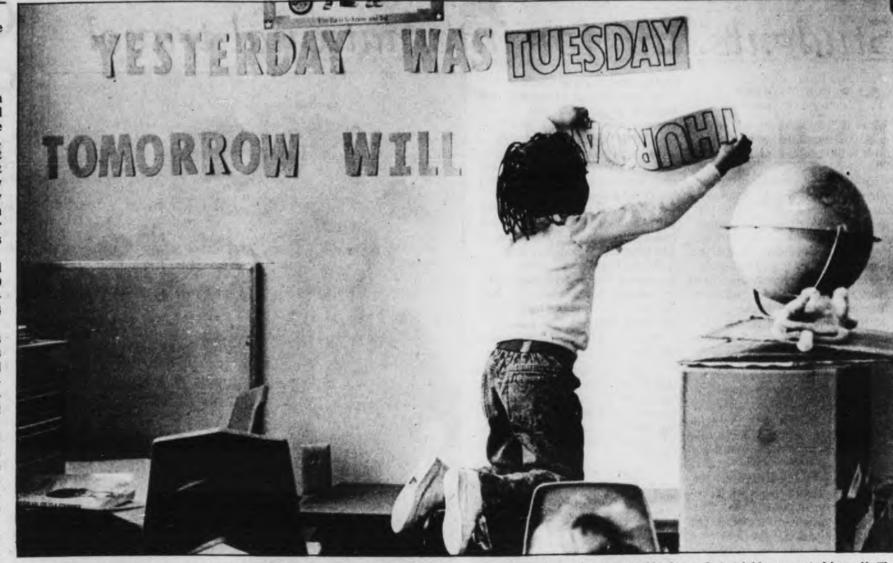

She said she likes the cooperative better than other centers because it places children into different age

Fahrenholz said the existence of the cooperative has a great affect on his family's life.

"If we were unable to find child care, either myself or my wife would have to stay home.'

He said they could look elsewhere for child care if the cooperative did not exist, but they liked the cooperative because it provides excellent service and is convenient for his family.

'The cooperative won't go under because it is too important to the University," Frith said.

Miller accepts Special Olympics' challenges

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

K-State and its athletic department loses a valuable asset this Associate Athletic Director Steve Miller's "last day in the office" is Tuesday. Thursday, he leaves Manhattan permanently.

Miller, head coach of the U.S. men's indoor track team, will first go to New York to select participants for the 1987 World Indoor Championships, March 6-8 in Indianapolis.

Immediately following that meet, he will put down roots in Norristown, Pa., where he takes over as executive director for Pennsylvania Special Olympics.

"I have mixed emotions," said Miller of his departure from K-State. "You're never sad to go in the sense that you're always looking for new opportunities and new experiences. It's exciting, but sad in the sense that you don't put in almost six years doing something and not have some profound and some positive experiences. I'm going to miss a lot of things.

"I hope I touched a lot of people's lives because I've certainly had a lot of people touch mine," he added.

Miller was K-State's men's track and cross country coach for five years before being appointed associate athletic director in November. He is also known for his motivational speeches, of which he delivers more than 200 each year.

Miller said he was offered the Pennsylvania position last year and turned it down. He was contacted again two months ago - "out of the clear blue" - and signed a contract with the organization about four weeks ago.

Miller said factors other than money figured into his decision to accept the position in Pennsylvania, which has the largest Special Olympics program in the United States.

"It's a tremendous administrative opportunity," Miller said. "I will be overseeing a program for 60,000 people. You don't get that opportunity every day administratively. I'd also like to live in the East.

"Even though I did just receive a promotion at the University, this opportunity gave me a major change a newness, a challenge. And last, but certainly not least, rarely do you get an opportunity to not only perform your work and expertise, but also affect a portion of society that needs your help," he added.

Miller had his first experience with physically disabled people 12 years ago with the handicapped son of a friend. The friend is a national director for Special Olympics. Miller held his first Special Olympics clinic five years ago and since then has done five to 10 clinics annually.

"People have a responsibility to each other that we don't fulfill often enough," Miller said. "I think that we're a breed of people that frequently - not always - but frequently, complains about the hours in the day, but find out we can do a lot more than we ever thought possi-

Miller said his new job is "a 24-hour day, seven days a week" position. He will have office hours, but he also has to attend special balls and charity events. For example, on March 26 Miller will have dinner with Bill Cosby and Julius Ir-

Miller, who said he is addicted to work, has three major goals set for himself in his new position: to involve more mentally handicapped people in Special Olympics; to make the state (Pennsylvania) more financially solvent so the "best educational-athletic experience possible" is provided to olympic participants; and to expand Special Oylmpics in the mind of the public.

"We all have a responsibility to get involved," Miller said. "There is a necessity for dealing with our handicapped citizenry.'

He said K-State's administration has been very supportive of his decision to leave, and that when he made his decision, it was final.

"Six years is the longest I've ever spent in any job in my life," Miller said. "I think a person is very fortunate to get the opportunities I've gotten. I have always felt you can either be part of the problem to a place, or part of the solution to a place. I have always chosen to be part of the solution.

"People always ask me 'Why do you get so involved? Why do give 200 speeches a year? What can you be telling people?" he said. "I'm not telling anybody anything. All I'm doing is sharing a lot of ideas. If I can get somebody's eyes to open and say 'I've never thought about that,' I like that."

I hope I touched a lot of people's lives because I've certainly had a lot of people touch mine.'

> Associate AD Steve Miller

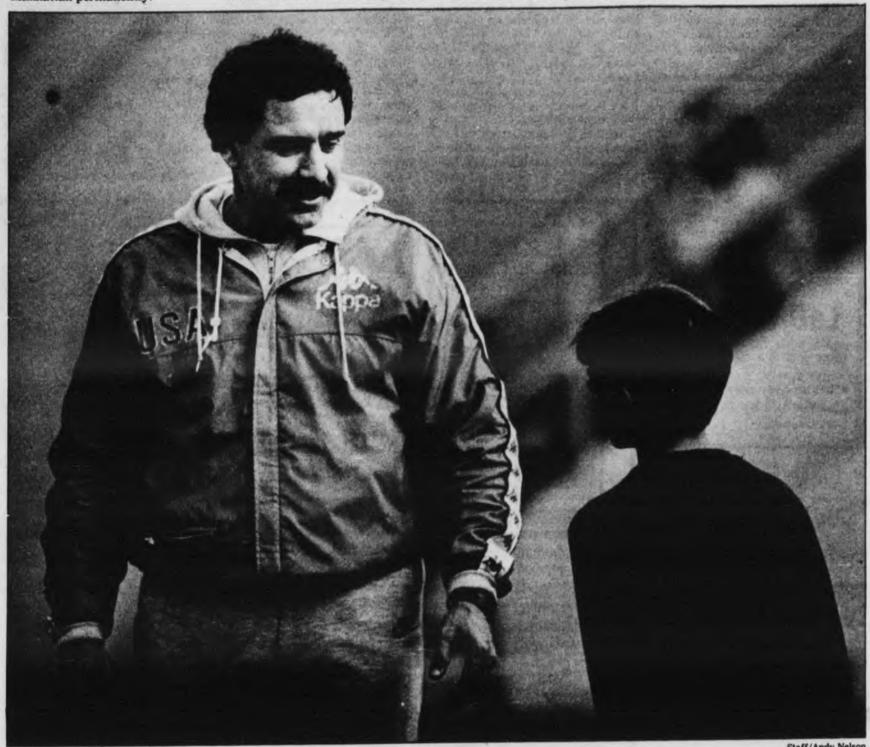

Miller said he will take several attributes gained in Kansas with him to Pennsylvania.

"Kansas has taught me honesty, sensitivity and stick-to-itiveness,' he said. "Be honest - say it the way it is. Be sensitive, because we're all in this together. And don't quit. These are attributes I've felt before, but never so glaringly as they have been in the five and a half years I've been here."

Miller's wife and two children will not go to Norristown until summer. He said his family is "excited about the potential for the future."

"We'll stay very close in touch with friends - personally and professionally - in Manhattan," Miller

"The two groups I'll miss the most will be the students - who I think that over the years, I have developed a pretty good relationship with, and also the Kansas State public. They make the program go. But, I have nothing but good feelings about (the move).'

Lady Cats discover Kansas' advantage in Allen Field House

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

LAWRENCE - The crowd may not be as much of a factor in women's basketball as in men's football or basketball, but home-court advantages exist, and it's just as difficult for the women's teams to win on the road.

The Lady Cats are a classic example. After a 68-63 loss Saturday to Kansas, K-State dropped to 2-5 on the road in Big Eight Conference play.

Thanks to a 6-0 conference mark at home, K-State remained in the thick of the Big Eight race at 8-5, and is in a three-way tie with Kansas and Nebraska for second place.

"The whole key was the first half," said K-State coach Matilda Mossman of the loss to Kansas

"It was our inability to get control of the game from the beginning and our inability to hit free throws that made the difference. They got on a roll and we just couldn't seem to get

K-State, 19-7 overall, started slow and connected on only 35.2 percent of its field goal attempts in the first 20 minutes of play. The Lady Cats watched their early lead transform into a 32-15 deficit with 3:48 left in the

"Our game plan coming into the game was to dictate what the tempo was going to be and we just couldn't do that," Mossman said. "We let them control the tempo, and then in the last four minutes they got tired

Kansas, 15-12, outscored the Lady Cats 12-1 during a five-minute stretch late in the half. But K-State rallied and pulled within 10, 36-26, at the end of the period.

"(The Lady Jayhawks) had been running down the floor so many times and scoring fast-break layups that they got tired," Mossman said. "We were very fortunate to be within ten at halftime."

Patience in the second half allowed K-State to close the gap. But an inability to hit free throws during the crucial times cost the Lady Cats the

Behind the efforts of Sue Leiding and Susan Green, K-State knotted the game at 53-53 with 6:39 remaining in the contest. Leiding scored 14 points in the second half. Green, after being benched most of the first stanza with three fouls, came back into the game and scored seven points.

But the Lady Jayhawks, who managed to keep Leiding and Green in check the rest of the game, regained the lead and never allowed K-State any closer than within four the last four minutes.

Leiding paced the Lady Cats with 20 points. Theza Fitzpatrick was the only other Lady Cat to hit in double figures, scoring fourteen in the contest. Green tallied nine, Carlisa Thomas nailed eight, and Tracey Bleczinski scored seven points.

Kansas was led offensively by Shawna Waters with 14 points.

'Cats collar tennis wins in Missouri

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

Improvement, not neccessarily winning, was the object of the K-State women's tennis team three-game road trip to Springfield, Mo., over the weekend. But this time, Coach Steve Bietau got the best of both worlds.

After losing the first match Friday, 6-3, to Southwest Missouri State, K-State came back strong Saturday and defeated Southwest Baptist, 8-1, and Sunday swept by Arkansas State,

The Wildcats evened their season record at 2-2.

"It was a great weekend for us," Bietau said. "We played some of our best tennis this weekend, and I was very pleased with the effort by everyone."

Starting off slow against Southwest Missouri State, K-State won only one of the first five matches. But the 'Cats finished strong by winning two of the last four.

The turning point for K-State was the performance of No. 1 singles player, Sigrid Ivarsson. She defeated Kathy Baldari, 7-5, 6-1, in singles competition, and with teammate Valerie Rive' pulled out a close win in three sets, 2-6, 7-6, 7-5, against the No. 1 doubles team of Lori Elling and Baldari.

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

This weekend's KSU Open Indoor Track Meet, the one Coach John Capriotti said would be a "low-key tuneup meet" for next week's Big Eight Indoor Championships, produced three Ahearn Field House records and featured the performance of an Olympic pole vaulter.

"It was a great meet," Capriotti said. "There were many outstanding performances. It was really just a great meet to watch."

The two-day event attracted approximately 1,000 athletes from high schools, junior colleges and universities around the Midwest.

Before an estimated crowd of 200 people, K-State's NCAA triple jump champion Kenny Harrison set out to qualify for nationals in the long jump.

Jumping under no pressure other than the qualifying mark of 25 feet, 6 1/4 inches, he wasted no time in surpassing that mark with an opening jump of 26-1. It also bettered the existing field house record of 25-5 by more than eight inches.

"I just wanted to get the pressure of qualifying off my back," Harrison said. "I also wanted the field house record."

Also qualifying for nationals was distance ace Ron Stahl, who put in an Ahearn record and personal best of 4:03.25 in the mile run. Chris Vanatta ran a field house record in the women's mile run with a 4:50.31. The previous mark of 4:51.3 was set by K-State's Teri Anderson in 1976. Pinkie Suggs once again dominated in the women's shot put, heaving a virtually uncontested toss of 53-0. Highlighting performances in the open division was K-State alumnus Doug Lytle in the pole vault. Lytle, who said he came here to gain confidence for upcoming meets, won the event with a vault of 18-4 - his best jump in competition this season.

"I kind of needed something low-key, a confidence builder," Lytle said. "It's good to come back here to relax and have a good time and see some friends.

Lytle also competed in the high jump, finishing second with a leap of 7-0. The winner of the event was Darren Burton, who jumped 7-2. K-State's Brad Speer finished

Other performances highlighting the meet came from Scott Lofquist, winning the shot put with a heave of 63-0, and K-State's men's two-mile relay team, who ran a 7:49.00 for

The only trouble K-State had with Southwest Baptist was in the No. 3 doubles match. K-State's Debbie Hutchins and Nancy Ramirez fell prey to Karen Surratt and Sherri Lane, 2-6, 6-4, 6-2.

Against Arkansas State, Ramirez and Hutchins weren't able to pull out victories in either singles or doubles competition, giving Arkansas State its only three victories of the day.

In addition to the time spent in labor and the recuperation following childbirth, two other kinds of disability related to pregnancy may cause work-related difficulties, Wigglesworth said.

One is the medical necessity to quit work because of complications with the pregnancy, she said.

Another is the exposure to toxic substances or physical limitations at the worksite due to pregnancy, such as the amount of weight one should

The known hazards to a pregnant woman's health are constantly changing, she said.

Pregnant women should keep a cache of non-perishable, nonpermeable snacks such as raisins and crackers in their desks if possible. It is important for them to eat during the day, she said.

Wigglesworth said she has written letters stressing the importance of this need to employers who do not allow women to eat at their desks.

recognized.

Johnson said he understood why the agencies were assessed a service charge in lieu of Gov. Mike Hayden's 3.8 percent across-the-board budget cuts, but he said his biggest concern is how future fees would be administered.

"In light of the fact that we did have the budget cut, I think we are in agreement of the fee that has been developed for this year, and the negotiations that you are all finishing up with the (agency) directors seem to be basically in line," Johnson said. "Everyone would seem to be in agreement that this is a good way to help out. I think the main concern is how we proceed in the future.

"A fee on the revenue imposes a problem in that most of these (agencies) such as Lafene, Student Publications and the Union provide additional services to the University," Johnson said.

One example is Student Publications selling phone directories to students while keeping costs at a minimum, he said.

Another example is the Union's efforts to provide a number of services at affordable prices for students. He said the Union sets prices at the most profitable levels that allow it to remain competitive without losing business.

Johnson said next year when the fee is assessed, the administration must realize that while the Universi-

"I'm looking for a good straightfoward method, but I want you to recognize we can't just look at the offsetting services," Miller said.

In addition, the administration has already eliminated some elements from the total income of each agency like interdepartmental sales, which is subtracted from the total agency income being taxed, Miller said.

"If we go look at the things that each agency is doing for the University without considering the other things the University provides to the agencies, I don't think that's quite fair," Miller said.

Miller said the administration has

"We are in financial difficulty. We need more money for equipment; we've already allocated money so we could hire the faculty to teach the courses, and we don't have the money.

Student concern

Ronda Corle, senior in journalism and mass communications and 1986 member of the Student Publications Board, said while Student Publications doesn't pay utilities and does use the controller's office, the Union does not use these same services.

"I am trying to justify what each of the seven (agencies) are having to pay, and I don't know the process," she said.

Mark Buyle, junior in marketing and chairman of the Union Governing Board, said he didn't know what the need was for the University to impose the fee on the Union.

Miller said the University does provide institutional support services to the Union.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, is the directer the Union from a managerial standpoint, while Miller said he is the treasurer of the Union. Concern among student representatives is that the charge is not being imposed fairly.

Buyle said he could not understand how the 3 percent rate could accurately fit each of the agencies.

Moore said it doesn't fit perfectly because any indirect cost rate is an averaging effect for all the agencies.

"The fee is based upon cost principles that are very welldeveloped," Moore said.

Corle said while utilities and a janitorial position are services paid for by the University, two faculty members in the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications are entirely paid by Student Publications, yet they continue to teach classes in the journalism departagreement that stipulates what services the agencies are paying for so that in the future the administration cannot impose a higher charge without justifying why they needed to raise the fee.

If each of the agencies wants a breakdown of the services they will pay for with the institutional fee, the University would have to do a direct full-cost accounting analysis, which means the money being paid by the agencies would be broken down into specific services provided to that

A full-costing plan would itemize all the services provided by each of the agencies to the University while considering all services which the University provides to each agency.

Minors pose greater hassle for local clubs

By JUDY GOLDBERG Staff Writer

"Did you see all the cops out there?" said a minor at Bushwacker's Friday night, as she attempted to wash off the "B" marked on her hand to signify she was under 21.

Yet earlier this month, Rich Kriftewirth, part-owner of Bushwacker's, 531 N. Manhattan Ave., said he quit allowing minors in the club because it was difficult to keep them from obtaining alcohol.

"You can't watch the people under 21 to see if they're drinking or not, and the penalty for it is not worth letting them in," Kriftewirth said.

Friday night, minors were seen in Bushwacker's, and though Kriftewirth stood near the door part of the evening, he said he was unaware minors were present.

"My doormen were not supposed to be doing that (admitting minors)," he said. "I knew nothing about it."

"(If minors were admitted, the practice) will be corrected tonight for sure," he said Satur- allowed in the restauraunt.

Rocky Mountain Bonkers, 1216 Laramie St., previously granted entrance to people under 21 years of age but will no longer allow them in the club, said Ben Salazar, part-owner of the club. He changed the policy after catching minors drinking in the club Friday night, he said.

"Last night we caught quite a few of them, and one started a fight," he said Saturday.

At Bonkers, minors' hands were marked with an "x" and patron's hands were checked occasionally for verifiability of age, he said.

Anytime someone was caught drinking illegally, he or she was asked to leave, Salazar said.

Friday night a minor who washed off the "x" attempted to purchase alcohol but was carded because he looked underage, Salazar said.

Aggie Station, 1115 Moro St., was the only private club open to minors when a Collegian article was published Feb. 3, but has since ceased the practice, said Terry Ray, owner of the club. However, he said, minors are still

U.S. arms to Iran, said his panel had planned to interview secretary Fawn Hall even before The Washington Post reported Sunday that she had helped North shred documents.

"Obviously this is something that the committee will look into very carefully," Mitchell said.

Hall, North's former secretary at the National Security Council, has been granted immunity from prosecution by independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh, her attornery, Plato Cacheris confirmed on Sunday. Cacheris said the grant of immunity from prosecution was made "in return for her talking" to Walsh. He said Hall had not finished in her dealings with the independent prosecutor.

The attorney refused to comment on the substance of his client's testimony. The Post reported that Hall told investigators she helped North destroy documents and internal messages last November.

In other developments: - CIA director-designate Robert M. Gates in 1985 agreed to send to the White House a memo favoring arms dealings with Iran, and the memo led to the first National Security Council planning for dealings with Iran, The New York Times reported in Monday

The Times, which cited sources for its report, said it was not clear what motivated Gates to send the memo, which through written by a CIA offical was at odds with conclusions reached by most CIA analysts. CIA spokeswoman Kathy Pherson told the paper "It's our job to pass on different points of view to policy makers.

-North urged State Department and Justice Department officals last year to seek leniency for a Honduran general convicted of plotting to assassinate that Central American nation's president in 1984, according to NSC document cited by the Times.

The papers have been examined by the Tower Commission and Walsh, and investigators want to know whether the efforts on behalf of Gen. Jose Bueso Rosa were linked to covert activities run by North while he was on the NSC staff, the newspaper said.

-The Salt Lake (City) Tribune

published a poll Sunday showing that nearly three out of four Utah adults believe President Reagan is withholding information on the Iran-Contra affair. The newspaper said that feeling crossed all political lines, even Republicans who usually support the president.

In all, 59 percent of Republicans, 92 percent of Democrats and 79 percent of independents in the state said they do not think Reagan is telling all he knows about U.S. involvement in the controversy. The poll interviewed 606 people by telephone and had a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent.

The Tower board, headed by former Sen. John Tower, R-Texas. which has been investigating the affair, is scheduled to submit its report on Thursday to Reagan.

Proposals may expand Regents jurisdiction

From Staff and Wire Reports

Two proposals in the Kansas House of Representatives would place the state's community colleges under the Board of Regents.

However, the proposals offer different rearrangements of the Board of Regents.

Under the initial proposal, the state's 19 community colleges and 15 vocational-technical schools would move from under the Board of Education's jurisdiction to that of the Board of Regents. The proposal would establish a "super board" composed of two seven-member boards under the nine-member

Rep. Phill Kline, R-Overland Park, said the bill would also allow the Legislature to instruct the Regents as to what it believes the Regents should be accomplishing. The Regents would have to give a progress report to the Legislature and the governor's office.

However, House Speaker Jim Braden, R-Clay Center, introduced an alternative bill Monday. Under his proposal, instead of two extra boards, the nine-members of the Regents would be split into two boards of four Regents members, with the Regents chairman serving community colleges while the other would be in charge of the state universities, KTI and Washburn. Final policy would be set by the entire Board of Regents.

The Board of Education would remain in charge of the vo-tech schools.

Each Regent member would be required to serve on one four-member board for no more than two years and then rotate to the other board. Braden said the rotation would be staged so that not all the members rotated at the same time.

Although critics of the bill have labeled it "expensive," Braden said he does not believe the plan will raise state higher education costs. Jobs would be transferred from the Department of Education to the

Braden said he had received much support even before he introduced Regents Executive Director Stanley Koplik, who opposed the initial proposal, said Braden's proposal was "more streamlined." "I think it is a workable proposal,"

The idea for a change came about last summer when the community colleges asked to be placed under the jurisdiction of a separate board, said Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola. A Kansas Task Force on Higher Education then proposed the creation of the Dean Prochaska, director of vocational education administration, said he is against separating the community colleges and the vo-tech schools

"I think it would be a mistake to separate the vocational schools and the community colleges. We serve the same clientele, and a separation might hurt coordination between the two," he said.

However, Braden said the changes would have little effect on educational procedures. The separation would just clarify things for funding

The local boards of trustees for each individual community college will still have most of the control, he

Hanna said he also believes changes will have little influence on the education facet of the colleges. "The schools will remain the same; only the boss will change," he said. "Until state funding of community colleges passes a 50 percent level, the local boards of trustees will play the major role of operating the colleges. Although Washburn isn't a state university, Braden said its inclusion into the reorganized board would be for coordination purposes only. "Washburn would still be run by the trustees," he said.

Columnist offers advice for improved sex life

By STEVE LAWRENCE Collegian Reporter

All those questions about sex you were too afraid to ask your parents were answered last night by James R. Petersen, "The Playboy Advisor," at a lecture in Union Forum Petersen first discussed oral sex about it. He said Playboy receives many letters with questions on the topic.

"The Joy of Sex' has only three pages on oral sex," he said. "None of the sex manuals go into detail."

'Out of 200 letters on oral sex, about 150 wrote that you should not do oral sex as foreplay," he said. "There shouldn't be foreplay, there should just be play.'

Petersen said Playboy did a survey in 1983 on oral sex and found 95 percent of all who responded per-

Many of these people who are performing oral sex are doing so illegally, Petersen said. "There are laws against oral sex in many states," he said, moving on to the topic of orgasms. "Orgasm is the way the body releases tension," he said. "There is this anger about sex. Americans are hung up." They are caught up in having their partner get to orgasm, he said. "The way you reach orgasm is by teaching yourself masturbation, Petersen said.

Ninety percent of men and 80 percent of women masturbate, he said. However, men masturbate about 140 times a year while women masturbate 40 times a year. "People used to think masturba-

Department to increase efficiency

By TIM STALEY

.Collegian Reporter As part of campuswide departmental restructuring, the Department of Human Development and Family Studies is dropping the consumer affairs and health degrees.

"The (University) President (Jon Wefald) has made it very clear that he has mandated the Board of Regents to change the structure of this University," said Department Head John Murray. The Regents have decided that the department restructure its programs to make them as efficient as possible.

"For this department, that's been a major exercise," Murray said. Part of this restructuring includes the elimination of both bachelor degrees in consumer affairs and

"It's a major change, but it's a change that's been coming," Murray said. "It's a very difficult thing to do and very painful in some cases, because we will be changing some things that have been in existence for 10, 20, 30 years.

"The goal is to streamline the programs and to serve the needs of the student," Murray said.

"I'd rather have a consumer affairs degree," said Mike Rainbolt, junior in consumer affairs. He said when employers see a student with a human development degree they tend to think he or she has a human development emphasis, not a business emphasis.

The department turned in the pro-dean of the College of Human Ecology, Feb. 13, and on April 4 the proposals will go to Wefald for review. Murray said recommendations came down from Wefald in late December, and if the proposals are approved, they will be implemented in mid-May.

"We want to restructure family economics to deal with the issues that are of concern to students right now," Murray said. These areas include personal financial planning and family finance, he said. "These areas are not covered in the College of Business or in the economics department," Murray said. "That's the area we have the He said these areas have been em-

For the students currently enrolled in the consumer affairs or health curriculums, their programs will continue through the course of their study, Murray said. Incoming freshmen, Murray said, will be told the curriculum has changed. New students will be able to get a degree in human development and family studies with an option in consumer affairs or health.

He added that classes available will, for the most part, remain the same. The only changes will be the ones made by the new consumer affairs instructors who will replace the current instructors.

Bills delay payment to ease budget crisis

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - The House Appropriations Committee Monday endorsed three bills designed to increase the state's treasury balances on paper by $50.3 million over three fiscal years. Described as austerity measures, the bills would limit state aid to cities, countles and highway programs. All three were proposals that came from Gov. Mike Hayden's proposed budget for fiscal year 1988, which begins July 1. One bill would limit transfers from the state general fund, into which tax revenues flow, to the highway fund, which helps pay for construction projects. Another would eliminate a transfer o money to counties for inheritance taxes collected, and the third would put off a payment of aid to local school districts for transportation costs.

In addition, the committee heard testimony and debated a bill that would boost state balances by another $19.2 million in fiscal 1988 and fiscal 1989. The bill would limit aid to cities and counties, some of it for property

"I'm not enjoying this a bit," said Rep. Bill Bunten, R-Topeka, chairman of the committee. There aren't any more tricks. You just have to make some hard

Man accused in diplomat killings

PARIS - A Lebanese man accused in the killings of American and Israeli diplomats said at the opening of his trial Monday that he was an Arab fighter and denounced "Yankee executioners" in his homeland.

Georges Ibrahim Abdallah, 35, spoke for about 10 minutes in what appeared to be a rehearsed monologue when he was interrupted by ludge Maurice Colomb, who said Abdallah was beginning to repeat himself.

When Colomb asked whether an attorney representing the United States and the wife of one of the victims would like to respond, Abdallah objected and, raising his voice for the first time, shouted he should not be forced to listen to a "Yankee criminal." Abdallah was handcuffed and led from the courtroom, and the udge called a recess. Abdallah's attorney, Jacques Verges, later said Abdallah did not plan to attend the remainder of the trial because he refuses to subject himself to French justice and objects to the U.S. government's role in the trial.

Survivor identifies 'Ivan' as guard

JERUSALEM - A survivor quivering with emotion testified yesterday that John Demjanjuk was the Nazi guard "Ivan the Terrible" who clubbed prisoners, gouged out their eyes and turned on the gas at the Treblinka death camp.

"This is the man, the man sitting over there," Pinchas Epstein shouted in the courtroom, pointing at the retired Cleveland auto worker and pounding repeatedly on the witness stand.

The outburst came minutes after he was asked to identify a picture of the guard in an album of photographs.

Epstein's parents, sister and two brothers perished at the concentration camp in Poland with 850,000 other Jews. He was the first survivor to testify at the trial of Demjanjuk, a native of the Soviet Ukraine accused of being the brutal guard who terrorized and gassed prisoners at Treblinka in 1942 and 1943.

Dernjanjuk, 66, denies ever being at the death camp and claims to be a victim of mistaken identity. He listened without emotion yesterday as his interpreter translated Epstein's accusations from Hebrew to Ukrainian.

The witness, 61, flushed and his voice shook as he said of Demjanjuk: "That's him sitting over there. Age has of course changed him but not so that he would become unrecognizable."

Court to rule on teen executions

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether the death penalty is a valid punishment for convicted murderers who committed their crimes before they were 18 years

The justices agreed to hear the appeal of Oklahoma death row inmate William Wayne Thompson, convicted of a murder committed when he was 15.

Thompson's appeal contends that executing teen-age killers violates the Constitution's ban on "cruel and unusual punishment." Of the more than 1,800 men and women on death rows nationwide, about 35 of them were condemned for crimes they committed as juveniles.

Of the 69 U.S. prison inmates executed since 1977, three were killed for murders committed before they were 18.

The high court attempted to resolve the same issue in 1982, in the case of Oklahoma death row inmate Monte Lee Eddings, but decided his case on other constitutional grounds.

Executives urge law on cable theft

TOPEKA - Executives from cable and satellite television companies from across the state urged lawmakers Monday to make theft of their services a crime under state law.

The officials said theft of cable and satellite programming cost them thousands - sometimes even millions - of dollars, and forced them to increase their fees to regular customers. One called a bill to make cable theft a crime an "important consumer bill."

The Senate Judiciary Committee heard testimony on two bills, one that would set up criminal and civil penalties for cable TV theft and another measure that would do the same for satellite programming theft. A subcommittee will study the two proposals, said Sen. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, the committee chairman.

Ralph Skoog, a lobbyist for the Kansas Cable Television Association, said Kansas cable and satellite companies lose between $10 million and $15 million a year in business because people get on a cable system illegally or buy or build their own descrambling devices for satellite programming.

Under the cable TV bill, simple cable theft would be a misdemeanor punishable by up to six months imprisonment and a fine of up to $1,000. In addition, people who steal cable to resell it could be convicted of a felony punishable by up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $10,000.

Official requests AIDS bill delay

TOPEKA - Lt. Gov. Jack Walker asked a House committee Monday to postpone consideration of a bill that would require all persons seeking marriage licenses to be tested for AIDS until a national disease center reports on the issue.

The Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta are now considering whether such a requirement would be an effective deterrent to AIDs. Many states and the federal government are considering testing requirements similar to the one proposed in Kansas.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. J.C. Long, R-Harper, would require about 50,000 people who apply for marriage licenses in Kansas each year to be tested for the AIDS virus.

Under the measure, district court judges could issue marriage licenses to people who have the AIDS virus only if they find, "the interests of the parties will be better served and the public health and welfare will not be injuriously affected."

Long told the House Public Health and Welfare Committee the proposed testing would inform people they have the disease and allow the state to keep accurate account of its spread. Many researchers and public health officials estimate that 90 percent of those with the AIDS virus do not know they have it, he said.

School officials said racism doesn't appear to be the cause of the fights, although they have had racial overtones, including racial

Community members grew concerned after reports of black and white students fighting at the Hutchinson High School and at a Hutchinson middle school. Officials told the gathering at the school administrative center Sunday night a middle school student had brought a Ku Klux Klan hood to school.

"We're here to see if there is a problem and to see if together we can meet the problem. But we're not sure a problem exists," said Martha Schnurr, president of the Hutchinson School Board.

There were five fights in the high school parking lot during the first semester. More than 10 have happened since school resumed in January, a school administrator said.

U.S., Japanese firms differ, professor says

By JACKIE SHOCKEY Collegian Reporter

In contrast to American business firms, Japanese companies aim toward selling on the international market, said Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics.

Nafziger spoke Monday evening to the Economics Club in response to Lester Thurow's address on Feb. 10 concerning U.S.-Japanese economic relations.

'While Japanese companies shoot toward the external markets, very few American companies do," he said.

Nafziger used one example Thurow had cited. One American telephone company believed the Japanese should switch their telephone systems to the American style so the American company could sell their product

Many Americans believe Japanese firms work better with their government than American firms. Nafziger said many of the "elites" go through their schooling together, giving them the added advantage of being able to have a good working relationship.

The Japanese school system is arranged so students are much better educated than American students in areas such as the sciences and mathematics, he said. They place a high importance on schooling which shows in college attendance. "The Japanese save a lot (of money) to send their kids to college...they have the highest attendance rate in the world," Nafziger said.

Forty percent of all men in their late 20s have finished four years of college, compared with 30 percent of their American counterparts, he said.

One area in which the Japanese fall behind Americans is the importance they place on educating women, Nafziger said.

'There's a high discrimination rate with female workers. Most simply drop out of the work force after getting married," he said. "If they choose to re-enter the work force, they almost always have to start all over."

Japanese managers have the added benefit of a steadily increasing salary over the time they work for a firm.

"The time horizon of the Japanese firm is longer than the American firm. In your large Japanese firms where there's a steep increase in pay it makes managers stay around," he said.

Japanese employees have helped to increase their economy's growth rate in comparison with the United States by saving more of their incomes than Americans do, Nafziger said.

Bomb threat made against Rec Center

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Collegian Reporter

A bomb threat resulted in evacuation of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex Tuesday afternoon, but intramurals continued after a brief investigation of the building.

"There was a call downstairs around 4 o'clock, and some unidentified male said there was a bomb in the building that would go off in about 43 minutes," said Raydon Robel, director of recreational services.

One of the employees at the complex answered the phone, Robel said. The caller hung up immediately after the warning, after which Robel called the K-State Police.

"The police came and we made a search around the building," he said. "We didn't find anything, so we basically just waited it out and let everybody come back in again."

Though problems involving intramurals seldom arise, Robel said he thought the only time an individual would make such a call was to possibly postpone a game.

'If there was some intramural game that they didn't have their ace player there or something, it's a way to get out of it," he said.

If that was the case, the plan did not work.

"We just backed (the games) up an hour," Robel said.

The only activity postponed at the complex was the 4:30 p.m. aerobics session, he said. Bomb threats are not a common occurrence, Robel said. "I can't imagine why anyone would want to call out here," he said. "Things overall go very well, and we don't have those kind of things hap-

"All we do is take the initial report, and we'll turn that over to the investigative section to see if they can do anything further with it," he said. The investigative section, a division of the campus police, will probably look into the situation today, Mellgren said.

Though officers are trained to handle bomb threats, the department does not receive many bomb threat calls, he said.

"We haven't had too many lately to my knowledge," Mellgren said. "I don't recall seeing that many reported over the last year."

Because the records were locked in a file, Mellgren said he was unable to disclose the exact number of bomb threat calls the campus police

Canada halts tide of refugees

By The Associated Press

TORONTO - More than 4,000 immigrants from El Salvador and Guatemala have found sanctuary in Canada over the past three months, taking refuge not from civil war and poverty at home but from a U.S. crackdown on illegal aliens.

"I like it here. It's friendlier. When you arrive, they shake your hand," said 20-year-old Alfonso Amaya of San Vicente, El Salvador.

He lived illegally in Los Angeles for four years before fleeing to Toronto with one brother and two

The new system is applicable to refugees from all nations. Officials said it is designed to distinguish between genuinely needy cases and those simply seeking a better life and a way around normal immigration procedures.

Before, Central Americans poured across the border by bus or took lowfare flights - dubbed the Refugee Express - from Newark, N.J., to Buffalo, N.Y., crossing the border at Fort Erie, Ontario, or in Quebec province near Montreal. They are from all classes. Most are Salvadorans who lived for years in the southwest United States. Most don't speak English. They applied for welfare in Canada until they can find work.

Film, talk highlight 'Date Rape Week'

By SANDRA M. SIEBERT Collegian Reporter

One out of three women will be raped in their lifetimes, and two out of three rapes will be committed by someone the victim knows.

These statistics were brought out in the film, "Rethinking Rape," shown Monday as a part of "Date Rape Week," sponsored by the Women's Resource Center.

"There is a fallacy that if it's someone you know...(rape) is not traumatic," said Judy Davis, director of the Regional Crisis Centera

In fact, the sense of guilt and the other feelings involved are heightened. In a discussion following the film, Davis said a woman begins to question her sense of judgment and believes it is her fault for trusting the Part of the problem is society's views about men and women, she said.

Men receive confusing signals from the media and society that say men must be strong, aggressive and in control, especially when dealing with women, Davis said. Men are told they must initiate sex because women shouldn't, she said.

Women are told they must try to please men. They also receive messages from the media and society that rape is somehow their fault, the film said.

Davis reiterated the concern expressed in the film about the image of women in the media, especially in advertising and pornographic films. Violence against women is increasing in pornography, the film said. One study showed both women and men were more callous toward rape after viewing a violent pornographic

"My kids see that stuff (advertisements) all the time, and they don't see pornographic films," she said.

Women are objectified in advertisements, and they are shown bound or in some other way subjected to men, she said.

After seeing a documentary about the portrayal of women in the media, Davis said she was not as disturbed by the graphic pornography as she was by a Calvin Klein advertising campaign.

Calvin Klein had two ads for jeans, one for men and one for women. The ad for men's jeans showed a man standing, wearing the jeans.

The ad for women's jeans showed a caricature of a woman holding her mouth in a suggestive wetting-thelips pose while her posture accentuated her bosom and buttocks. Davis said this difference in the way men and women are treated in ads

Rape is men's problem as well as women's problem, the film said. Men live in a world where women don't trust them, and they face the possibility that someone they love will be raped, the film said.

Davis said a man may have trouble accepting an act as rape, even if he has forced a woman to have intercourse with him.

A man often believes that when he takes a woman out on a date, "there is a tacit agreement that he's buying sex, when he's just buying drinks and dinner," Davis said. If a man would 'just say what he wants," many problems could be avoided, she said.

The problem belongs to both men and women, Davis said. But she is often disappointed that men don't attend seminars on rape. Of the 10 people who attended the film, one was a

"(Women) can take some very positive steps by saying what we mean and meaning what we say, and taking the ambiguity out of our language," Davis said, adding that women need to be assertive about their desires.

Dropouts no longer fit a 'typical' description

From middle-class white class households or single-parent families. Committed to ideals. And bored with school.

This, according to a study of the Houston school district, is an emerging picture of high school dropouts in the United States. The study of the nation's fourth largest district by an anthropologist and former school administrator indicates that all of the notions formerly held about dropouts are not necessarily accurate.

While the study is of one district only, there is evidence to suggest the problem is nationwide. For example, consider that about 25 percent of students drop out before completing school, a percentage which has remained constant since the 1950s despite numerous reforms.

This may be because dropouts traditionally are thought to be

Scholastic standouts. Under 14. students coming from lowerfamilies. Often, there is also the perception that only minority students are at risk.

> However, the Houston study has dispelled that myth. Onesixth of the dropouts were between the sixth and eight grades, and 25 percent of the known dropouts were in the top quarter of their classes in reading and mathematics scores, according to the researcher.

> This should be an advanced warning sign to administrators around the country that the vital reforms to prevent students from dropping out are not working and that efforts also need to be targeted toward the affluent and well-adjusted seemingly students.

> Realizing that a problem exists is the first step toward solving it.

National service plan completely unfeasible

young people to devote a year of pensions and family allowances their lives to military or civilian work is receiving increasing support from politicians and researchers across the country.

Although supporters for such a move cite several potential benefits, including the fostering of a national work ethic, promotion of economic and ethnic unity, and meeting a variety of the nation's domestic needs, the program in the guise of a national savior is nothing more than a draft.

Surprisingly, support for the implementation of such a program is not welling forth from the current Republican administration.

In fact, Democrats have come out in favor of it, while White House and Pentagon officials have expressed their dissatisfaction with the measure.

"A new system of national service will ask young Americans to return some of the advantages and investments they have received from our society," said Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., and 1988 presidential hopeful.

And, former Virginia Gov. Charles Robb, also a Democrat, said the implementation of such a program will "foster a new spirit of citizenship and patriotism."

Moreover, Rep. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., is expected to introduce a bill this week that would draft all American men and women between 18 and 25 for one year of service in either the military or approved civilian pro-

Although the bill is not expected to pass, the rationale behind such a measure is fogged at best.

First, there are the problems inherent with adopting such a proposal. Pentagon officials contend that the all-volunteer force has had no problem in the past providing quality recruits.

Furthermore, the Pentagon said such a program would be extremely costly and it would be

A program that would require forced to reduce military pay, to junior members of the enlisted ranks. Preliminary costs of the draft are set at $7 billion.

> Second, and most importantly, there are questions regarding what the proposal would do and the specific legal and ethical problems it may cause. Anyone who believes compulsory enlistment would "foster a new spirit of...patriotism" is sadly disillusioned. It would prompt apathy and resentment among those affected.

> Also, the "incentive" most frequently mentioned involves denying federal aid to college-age students who have not completed at least a year of service. This obviously, however, unfairly singles out the poor and protects the wealthy.

> So, that's why columnist William Buckley has suggested that the nation's top colleges deny enrollment to students who have not served the required year.

> How ironic. At a time when it is getting increasingly difficult to attend college in the first place, there's now someone advocating that only those serving a year of service be allowed into the nation's finest colleges. If attending college is elitist now, think what it will be like in the future if this plan is adopted.

And, as if all that is not bad enough, there is a little thing called constitutionality to consider. Such a program obviously is not constitutional. Congress is given the right to raise armies, but the Constitution does not give it the right to force people to work in civilian occupations - a small detail proponents should con-

This proposal is doomed from the start and any politicians who lend their support to it should be prepared for the potential backlash. It's ironic how recent Soviet and American attitudes seem to be reversed.

Locating right city not so hard

It's that time of year again. Mid-terms, Miami and money are on the minds of not a few K-State students. Some cannot see themselves as having a future much beyond next week's exams. As a vegetated body lying prone on a beach in Miami, others see themselves as making it only as far as spring break. And what of this concern over money?

It's that time of year when college students around the country are going through the love-hate feeling which inevitably arrives on the advent of the BIG "G" - graduation. Yes, it's time to actually start worrying about making a living.

So what do you do first? Panic and start another degree? Go to Europe for the summer and then decide? Join the military? One of the most important aspects of graduating into the job world — besides the basics of resumes, interviews and applications - is deciding WHERE you want to be.

For me, this is the first priority on the list of future attempts at getting a job. Once I have chosen the "where" of my future employment endeavors, then the resumes, interviews and applications start rolling.

How does one decide where to apply for jobs? I do not recommend closing your eyes and pointing to a spot on the map of the United States. However, do sit down and look at a map. Think of some geographical qualities you might prefer. How important are year-round climate conditions to you? Do you have a friend or a relative in a particular state or city who might make the transition to your new job a bit easier?

I have been giving this matter quite a bit of thought of late, since my school days are slowly (finally!) coming to an end. Through a bit of research, many phone calls and conversations with friends and relatives across the country, and based on my travel experience around America, I have come up with seven cities which have great job opportunities and very good living conditions.

Keep in mind when choosing a city to move to, your choice is highly dependent on what your profession is. A student would be a bit off base if he or she tried to go into farming in Los Angeles - no matter how tempting Los Angeles may appear.

The following cities are places which I have visited or lived in, and I have come to regard them as excellent places to live. Combined with this first-hand experience, I have scoured many magazines and journals in search of recommendations on where to live and start a career. The following cities, then, reflect those recommendations in that they have been chosen on the basis of their high potential for career success for the up-andcoming young college graduate:

1. San Francisco. This, folks, is my favorite city. The people are friendly, the city is beautiful and clean, and the range of entertainment is virtually infinite. It is an expensive city to live in, but you're bound to make an excellent living here once you get settled. The myth that everyone in this city is gay is just that - a myth. There is quite a large gay population, but one should weigh the importance of this particular fact about San Francisco the same way one would weigh the pros and cons of the heterosexual population of San Francisco.

2. Washington, D.C. Indeed not the most beautiful city in the country, but it has got to be one of the most electric. The world's center for politics happens here and it's extremely exciting to live and work in this atmosphere. Washington, D.C., is miserable to drive in, quite filthy in most parts, but the people are friendly and much more simple and down-to-earth than one would think in a big city. Pay is good if you get into anything government- or political-oriented.

3. Boston. Ah, a truly majestic city. Boston is old, quaint and very beautiful. Its biggest drawback is probably that its people are very rude. No problem, though - you'll get used to it either by ignoring the rudeness or becoming as rude as them. It's expensive to live here, but wages are good. Boston has a very young and successful population.

4. Dallas. A comparably inexpensive place to live, Dallas nonetheless offers all the luxuries of living in a big city. The locals are extremely friendly. Though Texas was hit hard by the loss of oil money, Dallas has remained a thriving center for international business. Lots of success to be found here.

5. Austin. Texas' capital is pure pleasure to be in. It is a beautiful city, offering a wide variety of scenery. The population tends to be young, and competition for jobs is not as severe as in most state capitals. The people are friendly and the cost of living is low.

6. Atlanta. This capital city has recently been designated as the most up-and-coming city in the nation. Its potential for growth and success is currently one of the highest in the nation. It's a quaint city, a bit on the dirty side, but its Southern charm and beauty override any untidiness. The people are friendly and the cost of living leans to the high side, but still is not at a level of an equivalent-sized city in the northern United

7. Phoenix. This is another city which was designated as one of the best places to achieve success. This capital city is sunny and dry most of the time. Phoenix has a simple, uncomplicated beauty and way of life something the Southwest specializes in. This city has a relatively low cost of living, and the competition for jobs here has yet to become cutthroat.

These are the cities I recommend for the graduating senior or graduate student to look into for future career endeavors. I realize that most K-Staters are from Kansas and I have not one Kansas city on the list. This was

Depending on the career field you are going into, Kansas may have much to offer. But generally speaking, folks, it's just not happening here. Indeed, there are specific reasons one would want to stay here - family, friends, a particularly good job offer in one's hometown or a farming-based job. But with the majority of college students aiming at big business, computerized and corporatetype jobs, it is only logical to go where those type of job opportunities thrive. Generally speaking, that place is not Kansas.

Quick pace yields to confusion

Over the last couple of weeks, I have been letting the rest of the world pass me by. I have been hard at work hitting the campaign trail and getting a real kick out of seeing my last name plastered on trees around campus. At the same time, all my teachers were trying to do me a favor by stuffing all my tests into one week so I would know if I needed to drop their class. Of course when they all do this, we have to drop at least one class. I think it's a conspiracy so they have to grade less tests in the long run.

With all this going on, it's no wonder a few things have skipped my attention. But after a couple of days of unwinding - in other words singing "Lean on Me" until 2 in the morning at Rip and Mo's - life is getting back in perspective again. But there are a few things really can't understand.

Life is funny that way. It seems the older you get the less you can understand. But there are some questions to which I really would like to know the answers. So if anybody out there knows, drop me a line.

For instance, how many times can President Jon Wefald say the word "really" in the K-State promotion which is shown during televised K-State basketball games? I've been told the latest drinking craze is to chug every time he says the word. The first half of this TV promotion is refreshing and appealing. But that annoying little fly that circles Wefald's head and that annoying little word make this promotion mimic a used car ad. If we make the Final Four, is there time to shoot another one?

And how long has Larry Travis been following Ed Meese's guide to popular democracy? I guess I wasn't aware that you had to be a ballot box stuffer in order to be a K-State athlete. But wouldn't you do as you were told for a scholarship? I would also like to know if it's true the K-State Police will be putting on an exhibit at the Union Art Gallery. I have heard there is a secret collection of portraits of some of those "commie" students making all the noise. Did Ed Meese put on a seminar that I am not aware of at this University, or what? I continue to be confused that people are still talking about an art museum. If we want to create an outlet for our "cultural" alumni to donate money, send them to the library to do a research paper. After five minutes they would realize we need a real library before we need a token museum.

On the subject of art, does anybody know the name of the artist of the mobile in the Union? I think it is important to remember the name so nothing like that happens again.

I would also like to know who is responsible for the 16-ounce paper cups in the Union recently. An economics genius, I'm sure. Of course students are going to buy the bigger size before they carry those tacky little cups around campus. I'm glad to see the Union attempting creative maneuvers to deal with its recent 3 percent surcharge.

And last but not least, on a completely different subject, does middle America now believe that the Russians want to invade the United States before the end of the century after watching "Amerika?" They probably do. Surveys show that 67 percent of Iowans believe that Australian Bishops have questionable morals after seeing "The Thorn Birds." It's a scary world we live in, isn't it?

Well, that is the rest of the big ones. Of course I have little ones that nobody has to answer. Like who would buy a compact disc of the "Beastie Boys," and why didn't Mike Riley run for student body president? But nobody has these answers. But if you, or someone you love, (I have been watching too many insurance ads) has any answers, I would "really" appreciate it if you let me

Professor receives virus study grant

By JEANNETTE O'CONNELL Collegian Reporter

A biology professor has been awarded a $123,295 grant for his support in graduate studies dealing with viruses

Richard Consigli, distinguished professor in the Division of Biology, is directing research on polyoma transformed cells-virion proteins.

He said this research will lead to a better understanding of how a virus infects a cell, what to do at the cellular level when it does, why cells become infected and transformed and measures to prevent viral infection.

Experiments are performed using tissue culture cells from "One of the best-kept secrets in -ment for the research. the world is our graduate program in biology," Consigli said. The division has received the grant from the National Cancer Institute for the 24th consecutive year.

A proposal for the grant is written every three to five years, and a progress report on the research is sent in every year.

"The graduate students are the unsung heros," Consigli said. "The money goes to support and train graduate students...they're the ones that do all the work."

Without the grant money there would be no graduate program, Consigli said. Grant money is used not only for research, but also for salaries, supplies, travel and equip-

Students have to be "kind of crazy" to do this research because they spend eight to 12 hours a day, seven days a week in research and in classes, Consigli said.

Although there are more setbacks than accomplishments in research, when researchers find a breakthrough, there is satisfaction, 'The satisfaction comes from doing something that no one else has done before," said Susan Marriott, graduate student in biology. "You can be the very first person to know something."

Marriott received her undergraduate degree from Iowa State University and came to K-State because of its positive reputation in biology. After graduation, Marriott plans to continue research with the National Institute of Health in Bethesda, Md.

John Ludlow, graduate student in biology from New York, will complete his studies next month. Ludlow said he was attracted to K-State because of Consigli and other faculty in the biology division who are willing to spend time with the graduate students.

Consigli said the success of a program has to start at the top and filter down. If the graduate program is good, the undergraduate program can become good also.

Winfield officials fire hospital superintendent

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Dr. Michael Dey, superintendent of the Winfield State Hospital and Training Center since 1981, learned last week that state welfare officials intend to fire him, just two days after the hospital lost federal certification due to alleged patient abuse and mistreatment.

Gerald T. Hannah, commissioner of mental health and retardation services for the state welfare agency in Topeka, wrote Dey twice in the last

The first time, Hannah invited Dey to meet with him Feb. 20 to discuss the situation and his future with the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

Dey was unable to attend and asked the meeting be rescheduled. In a second letter, dated Feb. 20, Hannah informed Dey his employment with the state would be terminated unless he could prove the action is without

In the letter, Hannah also told Dey he had been removed from the payroll effective immediately and told not to set foot on the center's campus. He was allowed to take unused vacation with pay.

"In the second letter, the commissioner told him of his intention to terminate him, however the decision was not final," said George Vega, assistant to Hannah. "He has the opportunity to come in and show cause why he should not be terminated."

Board warns students of misleading services

By TIM STALEY Collegian Reporter

Many students use the services of the Consumer Relations Board, yet others have never heard of it. The board was set up in the early 1970s to help students with consumer problems, said Kelli Carr, senior in journalism and mass comunications and CRB director.

CRB advises students on landlord/tenant problems, auto repair rip-offs, mail-order fraud, door-to-door sales, buying clubs that offer products at reduced prices and

In addition, Carr said the board investigates the reputation of businesses to help prevent possible problems. CRB maintains information sources on many products and services for student use in prepurchase decisions.

Carr said the board deals mostly with rental property-related pro-

"Between 90 and 94 percent of what we handle is landlord/tenantrelated or roommate-related," Carr said. "We have more people than you could possibly imagine come in and say, 'My roommate just decided she's moving out, leaving me with the bills. What do I do?'

"We encourage you, yourself, to write a letter first, and then file a complaint through us, and then we'll send a letter that's a little more strict and a little more professional," Carr

The board acts as a liaison between the two parties to save the student from having to find an attorney and go to court, she said. "We are trying to help students resolve these problems themselves,"

For students who choose to take the issue to court, CRB will refer them to the small-claims court and Dianne Urban, students' attorney.

"She can't represent you in court, but she can give you a background so you have a leg to stand on," Carr said, adding that Urban can give students an idea of how the case will

Carr said most students who use the board's services don't have the money or the means to hire an attorney. Thus, the service is free to

Joshua Iboaya, graduate student in agricultural mechanization, is one student who chose to use the board instead of hiring an attorney.

Iboaya said he did not know about the board but was aware of the students' attorney. He said he had been consulting Urban when he heard about the board.

He said his problem stemmed from merchandise he had purchased. He was sent the wrong merchandise, but the company would not reimburse

"You get these 15 rings for $19.95, and we've had people actually order them and contact us on how they can get them because they don't receive them," she said.

The board is staffed by the director, a paid position, and a group of students who receive credit for serving on the board and for attending a class that meets once a week.

This semester nine students are taking "Problems in Consumer Relations," the class that supplies student workers for the board. Prather, who instructs the course, said seven of these students are consumer affairs majors, and two are non-

Many of the students in the consumer affairs major go on to public education, banking or consumer services with major corporations, Prather said.

She also said often the students create their own jobs.

Many times the student will work for an organization and eventually try to convince the management of the need for a consumer service department, she said.

Beth Galbreath, junior in consumer affairs, said she hopes to go into banking giving financial advice or into government service.

She said the board forwards problems they cannot solve to the attorney general's office, and that she would like to work with the office toward a solution to these problems.

Wildcats to test Big Eight co-leader Missouri

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

Tonight's game between Missouri and K-State marks the close of the 1986-87 men's basketball campaign in Ahearn Field House.

It's also the last home game for seniors Lynn Smith and Percy Eddie. Neither are starters, but Coach Lon Kruger said they each have contributed to his program in different

"Percy has had an extremely disappointing year individually, Kruger said. "He hasn't been healthy and hasn't played in a lot of games. Despite this, he has been positive and supportive. Lynn is totally unselfish and very teamoriented. These are two great young men who have been outstanding."

K-State enters the rematch with Missouri at 17-8 overall and 7-5 in Big Eight Conference play. Earlier this season, the Wildcats lost to the Tigers, 68-64, in Columbia.

Tipoff for tonight's game is set for 8:05 p.m. and will be televised by the KSN-TV network.

"It's a ball game we need very badly," Kruger said. "We've been up and down lately. We'd like to be more consistent."

Missouri, 19-9 and 9-3, is riding the crest of a four-game winning streak and has won 10 of its last 13 outings. "They're big," Kruger said, 'especially with (Gary) Leonard in there. And they're always tough." Missouri's starting line up features three 6-foot-7 starters in addition to a 6-9 and a 6-2 starter. Leonard, a 7-footer who comes off the bench, has averaged 10.3 points and 7.7 rebounds in the Tigers' last three games.

Missouri is led by junior Derrick Chievous, a second-team All Big Eight player last season. He is leading the Tigers and the conference in scoring this season.

Chievous, a 6-7 guard/forward, averages 26.3 points in conference games. He has a chance to break Missouri's career scoring record held by Steve Stipanovich (1,836 points) this season. Chievous has scored 1,721 points in his three years at Missouri.

"He's a great player," Kruger said of Chievous. "He can score in so many different ways - inside or outside. Plus, he goes to the foul line a lot. He's also a good passer."

"We can't focus on him

(Chievous)," K-State forward Norris Coleman said. "That's what hurt us a little bit last time. We have to stop their other ones, too."

One of the "other ones" is freshman Nathan Buntin. He averages 9.3 points per conference game, but scored 20 points when K-State met the Tigers earlier this

"Our enthusiasm is back up," he

INDIANAPOLIS - Jackie Joyner-Kersee, who set world records twice in the seven-event heptathlon last year, was named the 1986 winner of the Sullivan Award as the nation's top amateur athlete Monday night.

Jovner-Kersee became the 34th track and field performer and the eighth woman to receive the prestigious award in its 67-year history. It was the first time ever women received the award in successive years. Distance runner Joan Benoit-Samuelson, who presented Joyner-Kersee with the award, was last year's honoree.

The announcement was an early birthday present for the former UCLA star, who will be 25 on March 3 and plans to compete in the world in-door track and field championships scheduled here later that week.

The versatile Joyner-Kersee, who began her career in East St. Louis, Ill., and now lives in California, was selected from a star-filled list of 10 finalists in national voting by some 2,400 people.

Joyner-Kersee, who recently scored a rare double in winning the women's high hurdles and long jump with meet-record performances in the U.S. Olympic Invitational track and field meet, smashed the world record in the heptathlon at the Goodwill Games by 202 points last year and topped that mark by 13 points during the U.S. Olympic Festival.

The voters had a list of finalists that included Navy basketball star David Robinson, Heisman Trophy winner Vinny Testaverde and six athletes who set world records or won major international competition in individual events last year.

The Amateur Athletic Union. which presents the award in honor of its founder and past president, James E. Sullivan, does not announce a runner-up or give vote figures.

Bruce Baumgartner, the first American to win the world heavyweight wrestling championship; and University of California swimmer Matt Biondi, who set world records in the 50 - and 100-meter freestyle events at the world championships, also were finalists.

is watching the play of his first recruiting class of freshman this year. Placing nationwide in search of talent for K-State.

Eddie Vaughn is in his second year as assistant coach for the Lady Cats and ing his main emphasis on recruiting, Vaughn spends most of his time travel-

Vaughn stresses academic excellence

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

A coach's job is to be a teacher and help members of the team succeed, not just producing winning programs, said K-State women's assistant basketball coach Eddie

"If I can make one of these people who somebody said can't get a degree and can't do good - if I can make them walk down the aisle one day and get a diploma...if I can help them win a ballgame when everybody early in the season said they can't win, then boy I've done my job," Vaughn said.

"There's my reward," he added. "It doesn't have to come in the form of a paycheck. That's what I want to do. I want to see them do good."

In his second year as a member of the Lady Cats' coaching staff, Vaughn spends most of his time as a recruiter. But he also assists as a coach on the floor.

After spending three years as an assistant and head coach at Mississippi State, Vaughn decided to move to K-State where he saw many opportunities as a recruiter.

Vaughn said a strong academic program, a friendly atmosphere, and a campus where students can walk around at night - in addition to a quality women's basketball program - makes a recruiter's job much easier.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

"We sell a small-town atmosphere where a Lady Cat walks around Manhattan and people know her," Vaughn said. "They might not know her personally but they say she plays basketball at K-State. It's that important. There's places where it's not important."

But there is one gripe Vaughn has lack of publicity for what K-State has to offer.

"Nobody knows this. Who's the third winningness women's program in America? There's not a student at K-State I don't think that could answer that correctly. It's Kansas State University. We need this publicized...we have so many good things to sell."

One thing Vaughn said he is proud of is that he's been able to honestly recruit the nation's top players.

"I didn't pay (Lady Cat freshmen guard) Carol Smith anything... she wanted a 100,000 to come to K-State," said Vaughn jokingly. "I got her for nothing. Took her off the streets of Detroit so she wouldn't get killed or something."

In his first year at K-State, Vaughn recruited six freshmen who have contributed to the success of the Lady Cats this season. The Lady Cat bench averages 15.6 points per game, 21.9 percent of the team's

But Vaughn didn't have any time off after recruiting last season. It was already time to start recruiting "(Recruiting) is a year-round process," Vaughn said. "I can tell you some of the top freshmen (high school) in America. I can give you two pages of what I think are the top juniors in America."

Traveling during the summer to basketball camps, writing letters and calling potential Lady Cat recruits are just some of the many steps in recruiting.

'We had some lean recruiting years, but we're now bouncing back...things are looking good for K-State," Vaughn said.

"I'm so proud of (the Lady Cats)," Vaughn said. "They've hung so tough this year..nobody picked them early. They wanted to Vaughn said this year's team will help the K-State women's basketball program in the long run.

"I want to win a national championship one day...but you build your way to that," he said. "These are the kind of people who will help you recruit more and better people, because they are such a class act."

Game plan is the same for women

By The Collegian Staff

Men's basketball coaches may get all the glory and publicity, but being a women's basketball coach also has its own advantages. Just ask K-State assistant women's basketball coach

Eddie Vaughn.
"It's great," Vaughn said. "Face it. Our team is good looking. We've got some good looking kids. It's neat being around them. My wife doesn't gripe because she even likes being around them."

If it pleases Alana, his wife, what else can he ask for? Especially when he is the "man of the house" of the Lady Cats' basketball team.

"Basketball is basketball to me." Vaughn said. "We run the same offenses (as the men). I (ran the same offense) with a kid named Daisy Casher who led the (Southeastern Conference) in stern Conference) in ng that Bob Boyd had done similar things two years earlier with a guy named Jeff

"Jeff Malone is now making six figures with the Washington Bullets and Daisy Casher is making decent women's money in Germany," he added. There is little difference between the players and coaching standards of women's basketball compared with men's basketball, Vaughn said.

The fact that he now coaches women hasn't changcoaches women hasn't changed his philosophy at all. He stresses the same things to the Lady Cats as he would to the Wildcats.

The game is the same, the drills are the same...the team attitude — it's all the same," Vaughn 'said. "It's basket-ball. It doesn't matter where you play it or who you play it

Howser's not ready for comeback; former Twins manager to lead KC

By The Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. - Although he had stoically maintained the helm of the Kansas City Royals after surgery for a malignant brain tumor. Manager Dick Howser decided Monday he just wasn't up to the task.

"Well, I found out yesterday I couldn't do it," Howser said during a noon news conference at Terry Park, site of the Royals' spring training camp. "I'm just not going to try to do it, that's all."

"I've been pushing and pushing since the first operation in Kansas City and the second operation in Los Angeles," he said, later adding that "it's not really devastating. It's just that I need more time to rest. I can't do it like this."

Howser donned his Royals uniform Saturday for the first time since managing the American League team in the All-Star Game last year. It was the first day of spring training, and Howser appeared thin and tired, his uniform hanging on him.

In interviews, he insisted he was capable of managing the team but conceded he would step down if it became too much. With temperatures in the low 80s Sunday, Howser missed a susbstan-

Howser said he already had decided to bow out when he went back to the park Monday morning. After sitting for an hour on a bullpen bench, he left the field for good.

"My mind had been made up," he said. "I wouldn't have walked off the field like that if my mind hadn't been made up. I knew when I went back in the training room it was over." Royals officials had said Billy Gardner, the former Minnesota Twins manager hired last fall as third-base coach, would take over if Howser wasn't able to continue as "If he's ever better to come back and manage, he can have it and step back in. That's how much I respect the guy," said Gardner. Howser, 50, isn't leaving the Royals completely and plans to serve in some capacity. General manager Joe Burke said he and Howser will determine those duties later.

Howser, diagnosed as having a malignant brain tumor, underwent surgery in Kansas City on July 22 and in Los Angeles on Dec. 5.

Howser never managed a team that finished lower than second. After taking over the Royals, he managed the team to the second-half AL West title, then to second-place finishes in 1982 and '83. His 1984 team won its fifth AL West crown but lost to the eventual world champion Detroit Tigers in three straight playoff games. His major league managerial record, including one game he managed after Billy Martin was fired by the Yankees in 1978, was 507-425, a winning percentage of .544.

Backing University athletics now feasible through ICAT Yesterday I spoke with Kruger

You say you want to get involved and support K-State's athletic programs? Here's a deal for you.

About 11/2 years ago, field representative Craig Renfro thought up the idea of "ICAT" to help get students involved in K-State's Mike Ahearn Scholarship

"ICAT is a student organization designed to directly involve the student body in the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund in the form of a booster club," Renfro said.

Benefits of this "booster" club are numerous, but it's important to note here that ICAT stands for "I Contribute A Twenty." That's I as in you — $20 that goes directly to supporting Wildcat athletics. If you've lost interest by now, don't bail out of this column quite yet. Read further about benefits offered and what your contribution would mean. With a membership you receive:

Kruger's case this season, it has been a common thing for him to meet with ICAT members every home game day.

- Cat Tales newsletter which is only made available to contributors of the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund. - Recognition in the 1987 football program of your contribution. With all this offered, I think that you really need to stop and think for a moment what exactly the ploy to join this group is. Is it monetary? Of course it is, but the 20 bucks goes goes to only to the scholarship fund which is essentially the backbone of the athletic department, Renfro said.

So, what else is it?

and I believe he summed up what ICAT is all about quite well. "I think that it's going to be an outstanding program from both our perspective and that of the students," Kruger said. "From (the department's) perspective, it's core group of students who are very highly motivated and interested in getting involved in the athletic program. And from the students' perspective, it's an opportunity to really get inside and find out what's going on and feel like a real integral part of the success of the program. I think it's a program that is mutually benefiting to both."

If you act now on ICAT you can receive a special deal. For your $20 you'll receive a membership for this semester and all of next year.

With this, if you're serious about K-State's athletic program, get involved now in ICAT. You can do so today. At 12:30 p.m. in the Union's Big Eight room, Kruger will meet with ICAT members and those interested to discuss tonight's game

Stallone's film, 'Over the Top,' easy to like, hard to love

By ANDRE KELLEY Collegian Reviewer

If you ever go to a movie and the opening credits show it to be a Canon Film Group release, that's your cue to run for the doors and get your money back.

Film Review

This studio alone has served up more bombs than Libya. These people brought us the mind-numbing Chuck Norris "Missing in Action" series, last year's stinker "King Solomon's Mines" and most notably, the big-budget Brooke Shields megabomb, "Sahara."

Of the few commercially successful films they've ever been responsible for, Sylvester Stallone's "Cobra" was one. Now presumably doing them a favor, he's back with his new trucker drama "Over the Top."

This time he's playing a full-time trucker and part-time arm wrestler named Hawk. Unlike his gun-toting personas of past, he's now an affable but steely "yo I'm ya fatha" type to Mike Cutler, (David Mendenhall) whom he hasn't seen for more than

Raised by his rich grandfather and sent to only the best military academies, Mike immediately shows what a spoiled and snotty brat he is. If this kid isn't bawling and running out in the middle of traffic, he's making snide, sarcastic remarks about his father's livelihood.

Guaranteed, you will want to slap this kid 10 minutes into the film. He makes it very clear as to why his father left him in the first place.

It's at the request of the boy's cancer-stricken mother Chistina Cutler (Susan Blakely) that Hawk is back to reclaim his son and hopefully win back his love. Rotsa' ruck.

At odds with this whole idea is Christina's father Cutler (Robert Loggia). He's not completely ruthless (he raised the child and he's got some nasty hired hands and a crooked, effeminate lawyer that's willing to do anything to get the boy back. Those beasts.

While Hawk and the boy are on the road (to see Mother and enter a professional arm wrestling championship in Vegas), a lot of nasty things happen. Hawk makes the brat roll up his sleeves and arm wrestle a bunch of grungy diner kids. The grandfather catches up to them, grabs the kid and after a very short chase scene, Hawk gets him back. The mother dies, and after blaming his doesn't want Hawk near him), but father and bawling again, the kid runs out into traffic and back to his grandfather's arms.

For a drama, this film has an awful lot of hilarous scenes, such as when Hawk goes to the grandfather's mansion and the guard tells him to 'go away." Stallone gets back into the truck and (guess what) rams through not only the iron gate, a stone fountain and numerous statues but into the very house itself. Boy, that's Ford tough.

Losing his son in a deal with the Twinkie lawyer, Hawk heads for Vegas, sells his rig and bets on himself. While working his way into the semi-finals, we meet some of the filthiest, loudest and dumbest wrestling rejects in cinematic history.

One of the " throw backe fard Hawk's opponents) is named Grizzly, and he drinks motor oil before each match. This huge, dirty, flea bag looks like Bigfoot with an overbite and probably has fewer brains.

"Over 'he Top" tries its very best to hook you. It's got a loving father, a 'cute' kid, and of course, the good ol' American spirit of competition. But aside from the scenery and a bunch of toothless contestants, there's really not much to look at.

The formula for this film is old (a returning father trying to vindicate his son's love), and even though Stallone does bring the parental warmth of Rocky to his character, it simply can't make up for his whiney, bratty son and an overloaded ensemble of stupid and needless players.

The best that can be said for this film is that you don't need subtitles to understand Stallone. It's simply a Rocky warmed-over and, like "Purple Rain," it's easy to like but very hard to love.

and others. As rumors about Regan intensified, Fitzwater told reporters that the president had not asked Regan to quit. Fitzwater said he's seen no indication that Regan is leaving and that the subject has not come up at senior staff meetings.

An administration official, speaking on condition he not be identified, said the reports of Regan's imminent departure were "a lot of speculation and a lot of allegation and not much fact." However, the official said Reagan and Regan might get together as early as next week to talk about the chief of staff's future.

Asked if the president still had confidence in Regan, who has been a target of criticism in part because of his actions in connection with the Iran-Contra affair, Fitzwater replied, "Yes. The president has confidence in all the people who work for him."

Meanwhile, a lawyer for Lt. Col. Oliver North's former secretary said authorities investigating the Iran-Contra case haven't sought to give her a polygraph test to determine whether she has told the truth, but they do have more questions for her.

The polygraph issue was raised by a story in The Los Angeles Times, which quoted unidentified sources as saying that investigators doubted that secretary Fawn Hall had been "totally forthcoming" and that independent counsel Lawrence E. Walsh's lawyers were considering asking her to take a lie detector test. Plato Cacheris, who represents Hall, refused to discuss reports that she has told federal investigators that she helped North alter, destroy and remove large numbers of White House documents.

Hall, 27, who worked for North until he was fired from the National Security Council last Nov. 25 for his role in the affair, has been granted immunity from prosecution by

Also on Monday, the top American military officer in Central America said that although the U.S.-backed Contras have a lot of problems they have a "fighting chance" to defeat Nicaragua's Sandinista government as long as U.S. support is continued.

With sustained support, there is no doubt the Contras can win," Army Gen. John R. Galvin told the Senate Armed Services Committee in the midst of a growing congressional fight on whether to continue American aid to the rebels.

The White House, already criticized by some of Reagan's closest allies as being adrift and paralyzed by the Iran arms scandal, is expected to come under heavier fire Thursday when a presidential board releases its report on the shipment of weapons to Tehran and possible diversion of profits to the Nicaraguan Contra

The bill would increase balances by a projected $6.8 million in the current fiscal year, $10.6 million in fiscal 1988 and $10.8 million in fiscal 1989. The measure passed on a voice vote, after a protest from Rep. Lee Hamm, D-Pratt.

"I think passage of this bill makes it hard to maintain the highways we've got out there," Hamm said.

The inheritance tax bill would end the state's practice of returning 5 percent of the tax it collects to counties. The change would boost the state's balances by $1.2 million in fiscal 1988 and $1.5 million in fiscal Lobbyists for county associations and county commissions said the bill was unfair and would hurt financially troubled counties. It also passed on a voice vote.

The school district aid bill would allow the state to make a payment for transportation expenses in February 1988 instead of November 1987. The state would gain $155,000 in interest on the money, said Gary Stotts, Hayden's acting budget direc-

The bill would base some aid counties and cities receive, some of it for property tax relief, on the old 3 percent sales tax, instead of the current 4 percent sales tax.

The move would boost the state balances by $4.2 million in fiscal 1988 and $15 million in fiscal 1989, because the changes would start late in 1988.

Ernie Mosher, a lobbyist for the league, told the committee it was turning its back on a long-held state philosophy of sharing some revenue with the cities and counties. He also said many cities and counties needed the money as badly as the state did.

"What is the pressing need down there that isn't up here?" Bunten Mosher replied, "Yours is simply more visible and more immediate.

Bunten then told Mosher, "You're asking us not to deal with (the bill) and at the same time make reductions to local school districts and virtually every program. Where's the fairness in that?'

However, Bunten said he plans to have his committee vote on the proposal Tuesday. He said he did not call for a vote Monday because he wanted to give members a chance to study the bill.

"It would have passed today," Bunten said. "It'll pass tomorrow."

Nuclear reactors, local site stir controversy

Former professor initiates storage proposal

By JENNIFER LINDSEY Staff Writer

A proposal has been made to Gov. Mike Hayden to turn land 2 miles west of Manhattan into a demonstration low-level radioactive waste storage facility.

The proposed land for the facility is located on the former nuclear engineering radiation shielding site. This land is currently owned by Robert Clack, former nuclear engineering professor and initiator of the proposal. Clack bought the land from the University four years ago, and plans to sell the land to the state for the site or exchange it for some other land.

"That is a matter of negotiation," he said. "It remains to be seen." Clack is recommending the aboveground facility for Kansas because believes Kansas needs someplace to store the waste.

"I'm not convinced that burial sites are going to stand public scrutiny," he said

"If a power plant was shut down today or a hospital stopped operating, there would still be a lot of nuclear waste (left to be stored).

"It is easy for Kansas to say, 'Well, let's ship it to Oklahoma,' but what is Oklahoma saying?"

Residents along Wildcat Creek Road near the shielding site are saying "No" to the facility for several

"We thought he (Clack) would give us some time to think about it, but he had already gone to the governor," Adams said.

WASHINGTON - The Nuclear Regulatory Commission, attempting to reassert federal sovereignty over the commercial use of atomic energy, was hit with a storm of protest Tuesday from state officials and local groups fearful of disasters at two East Coast reactors awaiting licenses.

At issue was a proposed change in commission rules that would allow the NRC to give new reactors a green light even if governors and local authorities refused to sign off on evacuation plans in the event of a major accident.

Gov. Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts told the commission, "The rule you are discussing today would make a governor's right to protect the public health and safety of the people of his or her state virtually meaningless once a nuclear accident had occurred."

Fearful protesters complain to commission

The hearing was disrupted several times by anti-nuclear protesters who chanted and sang in the audience. Several people were led away by security guards.

Nearly a score of citizen groups and other would-be witnesses, denied the chance to testify orally, registered their complaints in writing.

Dukakis, three other governors, five senators and more than a dozen House members were heard on the

At immediate stake was the fate of the Seabrook plant, in New Hampshire near the Massachusetts border, and the Shoreham plant, on Long Island about 55 miles east of New York City.

Both of the multibillion-dollar plants have been completed, but Dukakis and Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York have effectively vetoed licensing by taking advantage of the NRC's own rule requiring state participation in emergency planning.

The two governors have flatly refused, saying there is no way they can guarantee the safe evacuation of residents in an accident.

Dukakis said the Seabrook area "is highly populated and growing. We have about 50,000 Massachusetts residents in the Seabrook emergency planning zone," a 10-mile radius around the facility.

"That permanent population balloons upwards of 200,000 during the peak summer beach months,' the Massachusetts governor said.

Music trio to end after couple retires

By TERESA TEMME Staff Writer

When music professor Warren Walker came to K-State in 1948, University President Milton Eisenhower charged him with performing throughout Kansas "to as many people as possible...both young and old."

"Eisenhower stressed that music and the arts are very important to the people of Kansas and encouraged us to perform across the state,"

Walker said. The Department of Music will lose the Walker Trio when Warren Walker, trio cellist, and Margaret Walker, assistant professor of piano and pianist for the trio, retire at the end of this academic year. The third member of the trio is violinist Adrian Bryttan, assistant professor of music.

The Walkers began their affiliation with the University when Warren joined the faculty and Margaret began as a piano accompanist. She became a faculty member in 1971.

"K-State has been a place for me to work within the state, taking music to the people of Kansas, Warren said, referring to his membership in the Walker Trio and a University string quartet he played in for 32 years.

He said he has performed with both the Walker Trio and the string quartet at elementary and junior high schools, senior centers and nursing homes.

The Walker Trio will present 12 more programs, including shows for young audiences and several formal concerts. The trio's final performance will be March 26 in All Faiths Chapel.

Warren said during their tenure he and his wife have organized music camps, directed music workshops and raised $400,000 for music scholarships.

He said Margaret has been "invaluable to the music department all these years" in her position as faculty accompanist. 'Whenever someone would retire or leave to assume a new position, she would step'in and be in charge of the piano division," he said. Warren said he admires his wife for being able to manage the "two big commitments" of a career and family over the years. "I am sure our kids got sick of music from time to time, living with two music professors,' Margaret said. "That is probably the reason none of them entered a music career." Because of his love for Renaissance music, Warren

Student lobbyists oppose tuition bill

By TODD SCHULTZ Collegian Reporter

Twenty-two K-State students went to Topeka Tuesday to lobby against a proposed bill concerning the fee-cost ratio of tuition coming up in the House Appropriations Committee to-organized the annual Lobby Day to increase exposure for ASK and its platform, and to teach K-State students how the legislative process works, said Patty Hipsher, senior in political science and ASK campus director.

The fee-cost ratio bill concerns the percent of costs incurred by the University that are paid by students vs. the amount the state picks up, said Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics and student body president.

Currently, the state pays about 75 percent of total University expenditures. ASK wants to maintain this as a general policy, Johnson said.

Of the remaining 25 percent paid by students, in-state undergraduates pay a proportionately smaller amount than out-of-state students.

In-state students pay about 21 percent of University costs, while graduate and out-of-state students pay about 30 percent. This averages to make the total University costs paid by students 25 percent, Johnson

The bill would change tuition costs, resulting in in-state undergraduate students paying 25 percent of University costs and graduate and out-ofstate students paying 50 percent, Hipsher said.

The change would increase in-state undergraduate tuition about $150, or 30 percent, Hipsher said. Out-of-state tuition would increase proportionately, Johnson said.

In addition to the fee-cost ratio, ASK members discussed rising tuition figures at K-State.

A report was given to each legislator stating tuition has risen faster than inflation, per capita income and financial aid, Hipsher said.

The report also details a tuition comparison between Kansas universities and their peer institutions, she

K-State's tuition is $21 above the average of peer institutions in the country, she said.

Some students spoke with the House committee about the university funding system, or corridor system, and state work/study.

The corridor system is dependent on the number of students enrolled at each university. Currently, a 1.5 percent enrollment increase must occur at a Board of Regents school before it receives more funding. In the same manner, a 1.5 percent decrease will cause funding cuts.

ASK is proposing that the state require only a .5 percent increase in enrollment to raise state funds to the university and a 3.5 percent decrease before the state could put cuts into ef-

Men's Big Eight tickets available to students

By The Collegian Staff

Even though the 11th annual Big Eight Conference men's basketball postseason tournament has been a sellout since Dec. 19, about 50 tickets to the three-day event are now available to K-State students on a first-come, first-served basis.

Students can purchase the tickets, starting at 8:30 a.m. today, in the Ahearn Field House ticket office.

Tickets, good for all seven tournament games March 6-8 at Keinper Arena in Kansas City, Mo., are $40. A limit of two tickets per student has been set, and purchasers must have both their fee card and student ID.

Larry Travis, Director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said he started hunting for tickets at the request of students.

"We were fortunate enough to come up with some tickets through some of the other schools in the conference," Travis said.

K-State, which played Missouri last night in Ahearn Field House, is currently ranked fourth in the Big Eight. If the Wildcats maintain their position, they will play their firstround game against the No. 5 seed (Nebraska, Iowa State or Oklahoma State) at noon Friday, March 6.

Other first-round match-ups that day include: 3 p.m., No. 1 vs. Colorado; 5 p.m., No. 2 vs. No. 7; and at 8 p.m., No. 3 vs. No. 6.

Semifinal games are at 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. Saturday, March 7. The tournament finale is scheduled for 3 p.m. Sunday, March 8, with the winner receiving an automatic berth to the 64-team NCAA tournament.

According to a spokesman at the Big Eight offices in Kansas City, Mo., this year's tournament sold out faster than any of the past 10 tour-

The Raycom Sports Network is also planning to televise all seven tournament games.

K-State hasn't been to the finals of the conference tournament since 1981, when it lost 80-68 to Kansas. The Wildcats made the semifinals in 1984 and lost to the Jayhawks, 70-59.

Committee ratifies treasury raises

TOPEKA — The House Appropriations Committee continued Tuesday to ratify proposals from Gov. Mike Hayden to boost the state's treasury balances on paper at the expense of other programs.

Without discussion, the committee endorsed a bill that would limit aid to cities and counties, some of it for property tax relief. The measure is designed to increase the ending balance in the state's general fund, to which tax revenues flow, by $19.2 million over the next two fiscal years.

The bill contains recommendations outlined in Hayden's proposed budget for fiscal year 1988, which begins July 1. It is part of a package of four bills designed to boost state balances by $50.3 million over three fiscal years.

During discussion on the bill Monday, Rep. Bill Bunten, R-Topeka, the committee chairman, described the bill as one designed to restore fiscal integrity and help the state's troubled economy.

"After two major tax increases, in 1983 and 1986, we still have not solved this financial problem," Bunten said. "You can't give away what you don't have.

Colleges seek remedial study funds

TOPEKA - The state's 19 community colleges are seeking an additional $377,000 from the Legislature to beef up remedial education programs they say are needed to help poorly-prepared students make it at the two-year college level.

'For whatever reason, an increasing number of underprepared students are involved in higher education today," Merle Hill told the Senate Education Committee Tuesday.

"Experts in the field of remedial education tell us that as pressure to enhance educational standards continue the need for remediation at all levels of instruction is expected to increase, not decrease."

Hill, executive director of the Kansas Association of Community Colleges, spoke in support of a bill that would increase by 50 percent the amount of money the state provides to the community colleges to pay for remedial programs, mainly reading.

The state now pays the colleges $26.25 per credit hour for this instruction. Under the bill, the amount would rise to $39.375 per credit

Health center entices staff to quit

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - St. Joseph Health Center, hurt by federal cutbacks and declining patient numbers, is offering a bonus of up to $1,500 to entice employees to quit.

Under a restructuring program at the 300-bed hospital, employees who might be considering a career change are being encouraged to resign. The hospital is trying to cut costs and reduce staff from a current ratio of about 5.6 employees per patient to about 4.3.

"The main thing we're trying to do is avoid layoffs," said Mike Abell, president of the health center.

If the bonus program does not work, he said the hospital will be forced to lay off employees. Abell said a decision will be announced April 3.

He declined to say how many employees would have to leave to avoid layoffs. Currently, the hospital has 1,300 full- and part-time

The program began last week, and employees have until March 4 to take advantage of the bonus, which pays $750 to part-time employees and $1,500 to full-time employees.

Abell said the staff reduction is necessary because of cutbacks in federal reimbursements for patient care and the trend of private inurance providers away from full coverage for hospitalization. As a result, patients are spending less time in the hospital.

Governors request welfare changes

WASHINGTON - The nation's governors, reaching a "broad and deeply-felt bipartisan consensus," asked Congress on Tuesday for sweeping changes in the national welfare system that include requiring work or job training in exchange for assistance.

The National Governors' Association approved the new welfare policy with only one dissenting governor and, armed with Reagan administration support for the low-cost elements, sent its leaders before the House Ways and Means Committee to lobby for the plan.

"Welfare reform has been tried a number of times in the past and gotten nowhere," said New Hampshire Gov. John Sununu, a Republican. "I hope that the chemistry of bipartisan support that we are looking at here will give us the tools that will help get Congress

The governors concluded their annual winter meeting with the vote on the welfare proposal that dominated their four days of sessions.

They also voted strongly to drop their previous support for the 55 mph national speed limit and call for the federal government to allow states to raise the limit to 65 mph on stretches of rural highways.

House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, told the governors he welcomed their welfare recommendation and said "we will give it a high priority."

Booster builder accepts pay cuts

WASHINGTON - The builder of the booster rocket that doomed the space shuttle Challenger has voluntarily accepted a $10 million reduction in its fees and agreed to take no profit from $409 million worth of work that is required to fix future rockets, NASA said Tues-

The firm will also replace the rockets that were lost in the accident.

The agreement avoids lawsuits involving the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and Morton Thiokol, Inc., growing out of the Jan. 28, 1986 accident that destroyed the shuttle and killed its

"Both NASA and Morton Thiokol believed it was in the best interest of all concerned to resolve the matters without resorting to lengthy and expensive litigation," the space agency said.

Morton Thiokol is the sole supplier of the reusable solid-fuel booster rockets that provide 80 percent of the power to get space shuttles to orbit. A leak of hot gases from a joint in the Challenger's right booster is blamed for last year's explosion. The contract under which the boosters were built included a $10 million fee penalty that could be invoked for such a failure. NASA said that as a result of the firm's voluntary reduction "it is unnecessary for NASA to further consider a levy of the fee penalty.

Reagan doesn't recall approving arms deal

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - President Reagan suggested Tuesday that "it's possible to forget" whether he authorized a 1985 shipment by Israel of U.S. arms to Iran.

At a meeting with business executives, Reagan was asked if he was upset about a report he had been unable to say for sure whether he gave approval for the shipment - the first in a series of clandestine sales of U.S. arms to Tehran, with some proceeds reportedly later diverted to the Nicaraguan Contras.

"I'd like to ask one question of everybody," Reagan said to reporters and to the business group. "Everybody that can remember what they were doing on August 8, 1985, raise your Surveying the table and finding no arms outstretched, Reagan said quietly, "I think it's possible to forget. Nobody's raised any hands," and chuckled.

The president waved off further questions, saying he would not comment further until after the Tower Commission releases its findings Thursday on the Iran-Contra arms-and-money scheme. In other developments on Tues-

Lt. Col. Oliver North, a key figure in the affair, asked a federal court to block the investigation by a special independent counsel.

- Lawmakers said special congressional panels investigating the affair may vote as early as Thursday to grant immunity from prosecution to several individuals believed able to shed light on what happened.

- Fawn Hall, North's former secretary, who has been reported as telling Walsh's investigators that she destroyed documents, showed up for a brief photo session for news photographers at her lawyer's office, smilingly posing but refusing to comment on the case.

- Former President Gerald R. Ford, referring to the scandal that brought down President Richard M. Nixon and made Ford president, said at a Fort Wayne, Ind., appearance that "this crisis is not comparable to Watergate (and) I hope and trust it doesn't reach the stage Watergate did."

- Former Reagan aide Robert C. McFarlane checked out of Bethesda Naval Hospital, a little over two weeks after being rushed there after a drug overdose that police called a suicide attempt. McFarlane's lawyer, Leonard Garment, said he would "go back to work and resume a normal life as much as the various investigations will allow."

McFarlane, who was Reagan's national security adviser from 1983 through December 1985, has testified that the president approved the 1985 arms shipment to

For three months, the commission headed by former Sen. John Tower has been seeking to learn, among other things, the precise nature of Reagan's role in the initial stages of the program of secret arms sales.

Reagan was questioned Tuesday in light of a published report in The New York Times. That report said Reagan's inability to state with certainty his role in the 1985 Israeli shipment of U.S. arms has complicated things for commission members trying to sort out conflicting accounts.

Elsewhere in Washington, House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, asked to comment on the Times report of Reagan's uncertainty, said, "Well, that's an appalling thing."

Asked if he believed it possible someone could have forgotten such a decision, he said, "I find it believable that someone might have forgotten and if the president has a lot on his mind, maybe he did forget."

Donations increase

Alumni group acquires 1,000 members

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

Alumni donations to the University have increased through the growth of the President's Club, which received its 1,000th member earlier this year. The President's Club is open to donors who pledge $10,000 or more to the University, said Art Loub, president of the KSU Foundation.

The club has grown considerably from a membership of 141 in 1979.

"Our success really is attributed to the leadership we received from our national and regional chairpersons and the active participation and involvement of the president's office," Loub said. "It's become important for many K-Staters to be socially involved with the President's Club."

Clyde and Midge Jones, residents of Manhattan, became the 1,000th members of the President's Club.

Clyde Jones was a vice president of the University, a professor in the College of Business Administration, and K-State faculty representative for the Big Eight.

Jones is not a K-State graduate, but considers himself an honorary alumnus. Jones' three children all graduated from K-State, and this prompted his decision to privately support the University through scholarships and funds.

"Giving to the University makes a difference - to do the special things and not just the ordinary things. It is the icing on the cake," Jones said. "It is important to support your university." The Joneses' donations will be used toward scholarship pur-

The President's Club was founded in 1964. In 1986, the club's leaders set in motion a social group. Fall and spring social gatherings for members give them an idea of what is going on at the University and what is needed, Loub said.

To become a member of the club, a person can donate to the Foundation through various means: a gift of $10,000 or more payable immediately; a pledge of $10,000 or more to be paid within 10 years; a deferred gift of $25,000 or more payable by either a trust agreement, a whole life insurance program, a life income or unitrust agreement; or a matching gift arrangement of $5,000 from an individual with a corporate matching gift of $5,000, Loub said.

The decision how to utilize undesignated gifts is left to the discretion of the Foundation executive committee, Loub said. Gifts may be designated for colleges in the University, scholarships or athletics, among other requests, he said. Endowment fund gifts named after the donor are also requested by President's Club members, Loub said.

Blue Key deletes 'belief in God' oath

By JUDY GOLDBERG Staff Writer

The K-State chapter of Blue Key, a national honorary service organization, suspended its oath on the grounds of discrimination, said Kelly Welch, senior in agricultural economics and Blue Key president.

In the Jan. 28 issue of the Collegian, Scott Miller, junior in English and Collegian columnist, discredited Blue Key for a phrase in its constitutional oath stating, "belief in God will be perpetuated and intensified."

In response, Welch wrote a column in the Feb. 18 issue of the Collegian in which he said members were unaware of the phrase that was "buried in our national constitution."

"We suspended the oath because we felt there was the possibility that it could be discriminatory," Welch said.

The constitution is inconsistent because it includes a nondiscrimination clause that conflicts with the religious phrase in the oath,

With the aid of University Attorney

Dorothy Thompson, Blue Key members will review the constitution for additional inconsistencies and "things we believe are wrong," Welch said. The review will be used to determine whether K-State Blue Key members will propose constitutional changes on a national level.

"More than likely, we will propose to change the constitution," Welch

Another part of the oath Miller cited as discriminatory was, "the government of the United States will be supported and defended."

"There's a section in the bill allowing foreign students not to take the oath," Welch said.

Engineers make life's realities possible

What does an engineer do?

Someone out there is bound to answer that question with, "Don't be stupid. An engineer runs a train.

That's not the type of engineer I mean. Think about our own College of Engineering and the people who graduate from it and other colleges like it each year. These graduates become engineers and work for major corporations and small companies, private industry and the public sector. These are the engineers you may only hear about whenever there is a disaster related to technology, like the Hyatt Regency skywalk collapse, the Chernobyl accident or the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger.

Now, what does that kind of engineer do? Those of you reading this column who know an engineer or are studying to be one should know. Those of you who still aren't sure, read

In the 19th century, the common mode of transportation on land was the horse and buggy. Travel from coast to coast, for those who attempted it, took months or years. If someone needed fresh water in the house, chances were good it had to be hauled by hand from the nearest well. Today, we have cars driving on paved streets and bridges, airplane flights from coast to coast in hours and indoor plumbing.

Remember the well-used phrase "Necessity is the mother of invention?" Before any of these conveniences came about, someone somewhere had a problem to solve. How can we get heavy cargo across the river without sinking our barges? Can we get water into the house without having to go out in the dead of winter? Or perhaps it wasn't someone's problem, but someone's dream.

We didn't absolutely have to go to the moon, but think of the feeling of accomplishment of everyone involved when man took his first steps on the lunar surface. That too was a need to be fulfilled. And think of all the useful products we now have that are spinoffs from our space program - microelectronics, home computers, calculators,

Once that need or desire had been seen by someone, the next step was deciding on what to do. Someone had to produce an idea: a bridge, plumbing to carry water, an airplane, a spacecraft. That is always the easy part. Just ask anyone what we should have done to end the energy crisis, and you're likely to get several different solutions, from the well-thought responses to the scatterbrained solutions. Ideas can be a dime a dozen.

Implementing those ideas is another matter entirely. Sure, science says this is possible, but is it feasible? What kind of equipment should be used? How is it designed? How much will it cost? Often, many solutions to a problem are presented and never make it past the conceptual stage. Those solutions are useless unless they can be turned into

That is what an engineer does. An engineer takes the situation at hand and tries his or her best to improve upon it. Engineers have applied science and technology to almost every aspect of life, making what were once fantastic ideas a common convenience. Engineers have developed laser tools to offer new hope to the blind, and they have created computers which help paraplegics walk. Your VCR almost certainly came about from the work of an engineer. A hypersonic "space plane" to circle the globe in two hours is being discussed. Not all of these were dreamed up by engineers, but they would never have come into being without

From all of this, you might see very little difference between engineers and scientists. There is a very important difference, though. Both depend a great deal on math, science and technology in their work. Both the scientist and the engineer can apply what they know to new things. But a true scientist works to understand why things behave as they do. He or she often seeks knowledge only for the sake of knowledge. And what good is the knowledge unless it is used?

The engineer might also do research, but it almost always is performed with a definite purpose in mind, the goal of designing a usable device or process. The engineer may spend months studying a material or device to collect data, or may just work at the drawing board. But in the end, his work will be put to use in some way. And codes of professional ethics are meant to ensure that the results of that work are for the betterment of the human condition.

The week of Feb. 22-28 has been proclaimed National Engineers Week. The celebration is supported by many organizations such as the National Society of Professional Engineers and recognized by President Reagan and city and state officials. The hope of NSPE and others is to explain the role the engineering profession plays in providing for and continuing to improve our quality of life, our community and our world.

The typical American will see his lawyer on occasion or go the doctor regularly, but when was the last time you went to the family engineer for advice? That sounds ludicrous, because the public never personally interacts with engineers. Yet, many of the things around us depend on their work. Engineering is simply not as visible a profession as law or medicine.

That "invisibility" is not due to a lack of professionals, however. Engineers can be found at universities and colleges, conducting research on the forefront of technology and teaching the next generation. They are in construction companies, designing buildings side by side with architects. They are in major industry, spanning the gap between research and production. They work for consulting firms, advising their communities. Engineers can be found in all sorts of government positions, from the Department of Transportation to NASA. They contribute in many, many different ways to our standard of living.

True, this sounds like a group of people tooting its own horn, but stop and think where we'd all be without the work of engineers - still on planet Earth, still confined to the ground, still getting our water from a well out back of the house, still farming only a few dozen acres at a time.

Take a minute to think when you get into your car, turn on a faucet or do a report on your home computer. Every one of those was once an idea someone had to make things a little easier. Then think of the people who turned those ideas into reality.

Engineers.

report from the Tower Commission is scheduled to be released. Somewhere in the 300 pages of testimony, documents and data, should be provided.

For example, the threemember commission will report that at some point in 1985 President Reagan approved of arms sales to what he earlier had called a "terrorist nation."

However, the Tower Commission still does not know exactly when and how the decision to sell arms was made. One major stumbling block in arriving at answers to these questions is the fact that Reagan himself is confused about when and how the of the way." decision was made.

Reagan first told the commission he gave oral approval before the first shipment of arms went to Iran in September 1985. He later claimed he had not given prior approval. If Reagan gave prior approval to the arms sales, then he did so before an intelligence finding made arms sales legal. If he did not, then key members in his administration took part in an illegal sale of U.S. weapons. Another aspect of the report of significance will be its documentation of how White House aides teresting reading.

Such disclosures are expected to call into question denials from the answers to key questions Reagan and his administration that arms were not traded for hostages.

With the aid of the National Security Council's computer file, the report will also indicate that former CIA Director William Casey and former National Security Adviser John Poindexter knew a great deal more about Lt. Col. Oliver North's efforts to supply the Contras than they have admitted. The records show that North extensively briefed

Although the commission has thus far uncovered no evidence to prove Reagan was involved in illegal activity, it does clearly examine how the president's professed aim of establishing ties with Iranian moderates turned into an arms-for-hostages deal. It should also have something to say about whether the administration was aware it was not dealing with moderates but, by its own definition, what it had earlier referred to as "radicals."

Indeed, the Tower Commission report should make some in-

Kedzie stench

Re: Scott Miller's column "Stench of 'draft' infiltrating air" in the Feb. 18 Collegian. Miller accuses the U.S. government of preparing for the military draft. It's just too bad he could not have prepared himself to write this column as well as our government is preparing itself!

There are so many weakness in his column that I find it hard to pick a place to start, but I'll try. I'll start at the most uneducated and blatantly immature remark in the article. It goes something like this: "The essence of John Kennedy's notion of modern liberalism is ask not what you can do for you, but what you can do for your country." Miller said this 'smells like fascism to me." Mr. Miller, are

Kennedy was many things, but I don't ever recall reading that he was a fascist. It's only because you live in a country that bends over backward to protect you and your freedom that you're able to write National Enquirer slop. I guess in your future columns we will find out the ugly truth that Truman was communist or maybe Washington had AIDS!

I think if anyone needs to ask themselves what they can do for their country, it should be you answering that you'll give up writing.

Second of all, you make a lot of accusations about future draft plans, but where are your sources? You talk of operations to test whether the Selective Service, should the draft be reintroduced, is going to be efficient. Of course the government is going to have a viable and working system ready to go should the situation arise. It's this country's ability to implement operations smoothly and our constant practicing and repracticing that makes this one of the greatest countries in the world. Smells like patriotism to me. Oops, Mr. Miller, I guess you wouldn't know anything about that.

After reading your column, I think the only stench I smell is coming from Kedzie Hall. Robert D. Auten junior in history

K-State's 'finest'

Nowhere else on our campus are the fruits of tuition dollars more evident than through the services of K-State's "finest."

For the past three years, I've witnessed our police department as the subject of continuous ridicule, spite and disrespect. Let me take a moment to explain to all the ingrates on campus just how instrumental our campus police department is to the strive toward a more successful university.

To begin with, consider the thoughtfulness and effort they've put into keeping files on those who are politically active on campus. They want to let mommy, daddy, prospective employers and maybe even the government know just how well we are doing here at

Also, another appreciative note should go to the officers who cruise through our parking lots in the search for would-be muggers, rapists and thieves. And when they're not chasing a thief, they find it in their hearts to give us silly little tickets to remind us when we've parked backward, parked in a faculty spot or, heaven forbid, bicycled on a sidewalk. Since we're all wealthy college students, we don't mind forking out $8 or $15 here and there for our silly mistakes. In closing, remember that the police department is here for your protection. So, the next time you see an officer in action, take the time to express freely your appreciation. And, if I'm lucky, they'll open a file for me after writing this letter.

Keep perspective

I think a number of people are interpreting too narrowly math department head Louis Pigno's recent remark that "K-State may be missing out on some of the best mathematical minds in the world" because of the Test of Spoken English.

I don't think Pigno is talking just, or even primarily, about undergraduates who might have had these foreign students as GTAs, if they had passed the test.

Isn't he saying that many students can't come here at all if they don't get financial help, and that it's all of us - faculty, other graduate students, undergraduates - who suffer through missed possibilities of con-

I think Pigno is asking us to keep things in perspective, not to put blind trust in the testing procedure as a quick and easy way for us to resolve what is, in fact, a complex question in which we're all involved.

Bureaucrats rule China, speaker says

By KIM GREER Collegian Reporter

The people of China are tired of the bureaucratic system in their country because it controls their life in so many ways, even telling them how many children they may have, said a professor of sociology from the University of Michigan.

Martin K. Whyte's speech Tuesday, "The Fight Against Bureaucracy in China," was the first of three lectures this semester about social change on mainland China and Taiwan. The series, "Social Change and China," is sponsored by the K-State Graduate School, the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work, and the Pacific Cultural Foundation of the Republic of China.

What is being done about this bureaucracy that seems to have gone amok, Whyte asked the au-demonstrations on campuses throughout mainland China are the result of "vagueness" of calls for reform "from above," referring to the leadership of China. Pressure from below in this kind of system cannot bring about desired social changes, Whyte said. This is why attempts at social reform have always been initiated by the leadership, not the masses.

Attempts at reform were supported until the movement became too great for the leaders to control, he said.

'The fight against bureaucracy in China, it seems to me, will be a very long one," Whyte said. Thus far there have been no major Previous attempts to achieve these goals have failed. Whyte said the failures were the result of incorrect identification of the problem.

Mao Zedong Although Whyte said the recent student (Tse-tung), former chairman of the Communist party in China, claimed to be against bureaucracy, Whyte said Zedong promoted "structural bureaucracy." This means there was no private enterprise and no market system under his rule. The bureaucracy Mao battled was "functional or content bureaucracy," Whyte said. The system refers to structure of bureaucratic institutions, such as corporations, he said.

Mao wanted organizations to be based more on what Whyte termed as "charismatic leadership." He did not want any bureaucrats to become complacent in their posi-

"Mao's effort was fundamentally flawed...counterproductive. (It) was an aggravation of the problem," Whyte said. He said Mao actually promoted and enforced structural bureaucracy because he did not allow private enterprise or a market system.

Currently Deng Xiaoping, the head of military affairs in China, is trying to make China's society less bureaucratic in the structural sense, Whyte said.

For example, where there were once large communal farms, there are now more family-run farms. However, there is not yet a freemarket economy. In addition, the government imposes penalties for couples who have more than one child, Whyte said.

Whyte, who received his doctorate in sociology from Harvard University, has authored or coauthored three books about social institutions in China.

The next lecture in this series will be at 10 a.m. March 24. Richard Barrett, professor in the Department of Sociology at the University of Illinois, Chicago, will talk about industrialization in Taiwan.

Senate passes measure on abortion statistics

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - All hospitals, health care centers and doctors performing abortions would have to file annual statistical reports with the state under a measure the Senate approved Tuesday. Supporters said the measure would help the state Department of Health and Environment keep better statistics on the number of abortions performed in Kansas. Opponents said it could lead to harassment of physicians by anti-abortion groups. The Senate sent the bill to the House on a 26-12 vote.

The bill was one of six measures the Senate debated, then advanced to final votes under an emergency procedure. Most of them were technical in nature.

The Senate also approved a bill that would allow the secretary of commerce to declare some records of companies in which the state indirectly invests closed to the public. The bill also would do some fine tuning of economic development initiatives the Legislature passed last

Under the abortion reporting bill, all doctors and health care centers performing abortions would have to file an annual report with the state Department of Health and Environment listing the number performed and any other information KDHE deems necessary. The department could only release statistical totals to the public and not the names of individuals.

Currently, only hospitals have to file the reports. Supporters said the bill would allow the state to keep more accurate records on abortion.

"We already mandate that public health officials keep statistics of many kinds," said Sen. Ed Reilly Jr., R-Leavenworth.

However, opponents said passing the bill may give anti-abortion groups information they may use to try to pressure doctors and centers to stop performing legal abortions.

"I don't believe there's any public health reasons for it," said Sen. Jeanne Hoferer, R-Topeka. "I think the bill is designed to provide another avenue for harassment." The economic development bill is designed to clarify state laws establishing Kansas Venture Capital Inc., a quasi-public corporation through which the state invests in new and expanding businesses. It passed, 36-1.

Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita, objected to a provision that would allow the secretary of commerce to close certain financial records of companies in which the state indirectly invests. The secretary could close the records if he or she determines they contain trade secrets.

Feleciano said such a provision, in effect, would allow the secretary to close any records. An attempt to limit the number of records the secretary could keep closed failed,

"I do have a problem, especially if we're using citizens' money," Feleciano said. "They have a right to

Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, said the provision would allow companies in which the state invests to operate more freely in developing their risky projects.

"We want them to be able to make their deals," Kerr said.

The bill also would require all of KVCI's investments be in Kansas. However, the corporation could invest in businesses owned by out-ofstate residents if their companies were located in Kansas and employed state residents.

"We don't care who owns those businesses, as long as they employ Kansans," said Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence and chairman of the Senate Economic Development Com-

Syrians cut factional fighting Violence in Beirut increases

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Syrian troops killed 23 Shiite Moslem zealots and three Druse militiamen in west Beirut Tuesday in a crackdown intended to stamp out factional bloodletting in the capital's Moslem sector, police said.

A hospital official said all the Shiite fatalities were "axed or bayoneted to death."

Police said the Syrians clashed with fighters of Hezbollah, or Party of God, in west Beirut's Moslem neighborhood of Bourj Hammoud at 9:15 p.m. The mortally wounded Hezbollah fighters were rushed to the Moslem-controlled Beirut hospital.

"They were all dead when they were brought in. They were all axed or bayoneted to death," Beirut hospital manager Abdullah Nawfal told The Associated Press. "They were killed in hand-to-hand

The clash was the most serious confrontation involving the Syrians since they intervened to quell factional fighting in Beirut's Moslem sector Sunday. It could strain relations between Iran and Syria, which is the strongest Arab ally of the Persian nation in its 61/2-year-old war with Arab Iraq.

Earlier Tuesday, Syrian foot patrols marched into west Beirut's battle zone to occupy Druse and Shiite militia strongholds and killed three Druse militiamen who refused to obey an order to halt.

The rival Druse and Shiite forces, who have battled a week for control of west Beirut, pulled out of most strongpoints ahead of the Syrian soldiers.

Assassins who were not identified shot down two ranking Communists in the ancient southern port of Sidon, 25 miles south of Beirut. Twelve members of the pro-Moscow Lebanese Communist Party have been slain in south Lebanon in the past nine days.

Thousands of Syrian soldiers and 100 tanks moved into Beirut's Moslem sector Sunday to end a weeklong war between a Druse-Communist alliance and the Shiite Moslem militia Amal in which at least 300 people were reported killed and 1,300 wounded. Moslem leaders asked Syria to stop the battle for control of west Beirut.

The intervention force's size originally was estimated at 4,000 men, but Syrian military sources said Tuesday it consisted of two armored and mechanized brigades totaling 6,400 men, backed by an 800-member Special Forces paratroop battalion.

President Hafez Assad of Syria, Lebanon's main power broker, keeps 25,000 soldiers in the eastern and northern parts of the country. His government supports all factions involved in the west Beirut battle.

Syrian troops took over 50 neighborhood militia offices Tuesday. Police said the three gunmen killed in the seaside Raouche district were the first fatalities since the Syrians arrived.

Police would not identify the victims, all apparently in their early 20s, but several witnesses said they were members of Walid Jumblatt's Druse militia. Raouche is a Druse stronghold.

Syrian troops took over the main Druse barracks in the seafront Ein Mreisseh district; the unfinished 40-story Murr Tower, which was controlled by Amal and is Beirut's tallest building, and Hezbollah's Fathalla base in the Shiite slum district of Basta, police reported.

House may kill highway bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - A bill that would authorize $477 million in new highway construction across Kansas does not yet have enough support to win endorsement from the House Transportation Committee, the chairman of the panel conceded

Rep. Rex Crowell made the assessment after several members of his committee were highly critical of the measure during the first of three days of scheduled hearings on the proposed construction program. The bill would pay for the road work through a 5-cent per gallon increase in the state's motor fuels tax.

"There's probably not enough support now," said Crowell, R-Longton. But with a little fine tuning, it could have a good chance of coming out of committee." Crowell, who sponsored the bill along with Rep. Tim Shallenburger, R-Baxter Springs, said it's possible the bill could pick up some of the necessary support by including more construction work in places such as western Kansas. A similar proposal is under consideration in the Senate.

As introduced, Crowell's bill would finance $248 million worth of modern super-two highways across southeast Kansas - nearly all of the work recommended in January by a Kansas Turnpike Authority study of options for building new roads.

However, the bill would not finance similar improvements along three segments of highway in western Kansas, all of which were recommended in a companion study.

The only work west of U.S. 81 the bill would include is $41.7 million worth of "super-two" two-lane construction along U.S. 54 from Wichita to Bucklin and completion a fourlane section of Kansas 96 from Wichita to Hutchinson, estimated to cost $49.8 million.

The KTA studies, which the Legislature approved last year at a 800,000, recommended building the more economical "super-two" roadways in most cases rather than four-lane highways. A super-two highway is a two-lane road with broad shoulders that employs the frequent use of special passing

Rep. Eugene Shore, R-Johnson, called the bill "flawed" because it does not include provisions to upgrade U.S. 154 and U.S. 50 from Bucklin to the Colorado line via Garden City, U.S. 54 from Bucklin to the Oklahoma line and the so-called "northwest passage" from Hutchinson through Great Bend to Hays or

All three of those segments were included in the feasibility studies but Crowell said he left them out because the recommendations said the sections were not top construction priorities. He said the studies recommended proceeding with nearly all of the work in southeast Kansas.

Other committee members, such as Rep. Vince Snowbarger, R-Olathe, criticized the proposal because it included some construction work the Kansas Department of Transportation has never seriously

"Are we doing this for economic development or are we just setting a dollar amount and Christmas treeing it until we reach that point," Snowbarger asked.

In addition to the work in southeastern and southwestern sections of the state, the bill would

Half of the remaining 2-cent inwould go for road construc tion by local governments and the rest would provide the financially troubled state highway construction fund a $14.5 million shot in the arm each year. Crowell said he was open to compromise on all of those provisions as well.

Kansas currently has an 11-cent per gallon motor fuels tax.

Committee condemns nuclear developments

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - South Africa's white-minority government may have built as many as a dozen nuclear weapons which could fall into the hands of a "radical ruling faction" or be used by terrorists, according to a study released Tuesday.

The frightening prospect was raised in a report on the global spread of nuclear weapons issued by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

The report was prepared by Leonard S. Spector, an associate at the private organization, who told the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee that "recent (proliferation) developments are profoundly troubling."

Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, chairman of the panel, said at a hearing called to discuss the report that the United States must take steps to "protect both ourselves and the international community from the global insecurity that arises from the proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Spector's report reviewed developments around the globe which could lead to the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Officially, five nations say they possess nuclear weapons - the United States, the Soviet Union, China, France and Great Britain. A sixth, India, successfully conducted an atomic test in 1974 but is not believed to have built a stockpile of weapons.

Several other nations are believed to either have secret atomic stockpiles or be able to produce weapons in short order, including South Africa, Israel and Pakistan. None of the three has publicly confirmed that it possesses nuclear weapons.

One of the most threatening situations is South Africa, Spector said, which has a large natural store of uranium along with the ability to enrich the material to bomb-grade status. He said the country probably has been able to build atomic weapons for six or seven years.

"In view of past South African activities indicating an intent to develop nuclear arms, there is reason for concern that between mid-1985 and mid-1986, Pretoria used this capability either to add to its stocks of nuclear-weapons material, or, if it has indeed decided to build nuclear arms, to add several weapons to an undeclared nuclear arsenal of perhaps a dozen bombs," Spector said.

But he noted that "it is difficult to imagine" the white-ruled government "using its nuclear capability against any external threat that it is likely to confront in the forseeable future, and nuclear arms would be even less useful in dealing with internal civil strife.'

"Rather, South Africa's white minority government has probably maintained its nuclear status despite its lack of military utility to intimidate regional adversaries and lend the minority regime an aura of permanence and credibility," Spector concluded.

But as the black majority in South Africa struggles for control, the report said, there is the possibility that atomic weapons "might fall into the hands of a radical ruling faction - black or white - which might use or threaten to use them to advance extremist objectives.'

In other findings, the report said:

Israel may have acquired enough nuclear weaponry "to level every urban center in the Middle East" with a population of over

The assessment is based, in part. on the disclosures of a former nuclear technician, Mordechai Vanunu, who suggested that Israel's nuclear arsenal may number 100 to 200 weapons. Vanunu is now on trial for making public secret information about the Israeli program.

Israel's long-standing position has been not to comment on its nuclear weapons capability. It has said, however, it will not be the first country to use such weaponry.

- Pakistan may be in a position to manufacture all necessary components for nuclear arms. "A consensus appears to have emerged that Pakistan is at the nuclear weapons threshhold: it either possesses all of the components needed to manufacture one or several atom bombs or else remains just short of this goal."

- The shah of Iran, shortly before his ousting in 1979, began work on a nuclear weapons research program that presumably has been inherited by the government of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

Mexican food retains history, culture through centuries-old national recipes

By SARAH KESSINGER

Arts & Entertainment Editor

Few countries can boast that the food of their modern-day kitchens bears a close resemblance to that prepared hundreds of years ago.

Mexico enjoys this privilege as its rich history is reflected in the exotic and varied dishes dating back to long before the Spanish conquest in 1521 and still being prepared today.

The basic foods in many Mexican homes are corn, beans and squash cooked with a variety of ingredients and in a number of ways. Corn tortillas are the bread of many Mexicans and beans, or frijoles, are a part of most meals.

Many foreigners cringe at the thought of the burning sensation they associate with Mexican cuisine. Picante it can be, but most Mexican specialties are quite delightful without any chile pep-

There is always a bowl of salsa (from green or red peppers) on every Mexican restaurant's table, and most Mexicans love to pour it on their tacos, scrambled eggs and other foods. The dish, as served, is usually not hotly spiced.

When Mexicans say their cooking is very "chemical," they are not kidding. Rarely do women use a mix for any part of the comida, (the main meal served about 2 p.m.). With a wide variety of spices and produce, depending on the region of the country, cooking can be a time-consuming process. However, in the following recipes from the kitchen of Douglas Benson, associate professor of Spanish, and wife, Cecille, amends have been made, though taste was not sacrificed, to create a simpler set of New Mexican variations on Mexican recipes.

"Bread and milk are good accompaniments for chile dishes that 'sneak up' on you; so are wheat flour tortillas," the Bensons advise. "Beer and Coke, with their high amount of carbonation, are the worst possible thing to drink with spicy food if you're not accustomed Old El Paso, Ortega, Del Monte, Zapata, La Siesta, Candy's and Lucerne are brands of Mexican staples found at local food stores.

FLOUR TORTILLA

QUESADILLAS Put grated cheese (cheddar, Monterey Jack or combination) on one half of a flour tortilla; spread some chopped green chile on top if desired. Fold over and heat on medium hot griddle (no oil) until cheese melts.

CHILE CON QUESO (chile with cheese dip) 1 lb. processed cheese (Velveeta or American cheese food) or 11/2 cups processed cheese and 1/2 cup cheddar (tangier flavor) 1 4-oz. can taco sauce (tomatoes and green chiles)

1/8 tsp. garlic powder 1/2 cup evaporated milk or light

2 green onions, finely chopped (op-

Cube the cheese(s) and melt together over low heat (easy in microwave). After cheese melts, add cream or evaporated milk, stirring constantly. Add taco sauce, garlic powder and onion (if desired). Stir to blend flavors, adding more milk or cream as needed for smooth consistency. Heat for about 15 minutes. This dip is best if made a day in advance, refrigerated and then reheated. At serving time, a chafing dish (heated by a candle) will keep it at serving temperature. Serve with tostados or commercial chips.

In Mexico, chile con queso is used more often as a sauce to pour over foods like enchiladas or meats. TACOS

Yield: 12 tacos Oven: 350 degrees 1 dozen corn tortillas (or prepared taco shells) Shortening or oil

1 lb. ground beef, browned and thoroughly cooked 1/2 tsp. garlic powder Salt and pepper to taste

11/2-2 cups grated cheddar cheese 1 fresh tomato, chopped 2 cups shredded lettuce 1 small onion, chopped (optional) taco sauce Fry tortillas on both sides in oneinch hot fat (or deeper) using medium heat. Fry only a few seconds on each side, until slightly crisp but still pliable. Before doing second side, fold in half with edges apart enough to hold filling (U-shape). Hold edges apart while one side becomes crisp, then turn and fry last side. (Skip this step if using prepared taco shells.) Drain excess fat off browned beef; season with garlic powder, salt and pepper. Place meat, onion (if desired) and cheese in layers in upright, and heat in 350-degree oven for 5-10 minutes to melt cheese and warm shells. Add lettuce, tomato and sauce after removing them from the oven. Cheese can be added after warming. Variations: Use cooked shredded chicken, pork or turkey; refried beans, and/or guacamole in place of ground beef. Chicken and green chile are used in tacos frequently in Mexico and New Mexico. Tacos can also be rolled into a cylinder with meat/cheese inside, fried lightly, and then served with the sauce as a dip. Cylindrical tacos are called flautas or taquitas. Serve lettuce and tomato as a side dish.

SOPAIPILLAS (puffy fried bread) Yield: about 4 dozen 4 cups flour 1-2 tsp. salt, to taste 4 tsp. baking powder 1/4 cup shortening or lard 1-11/2 cups warm water

Vegetable fat for frying Sift flour, salt and baking powder together. Work shortening into flour until well blended. Add enough water to make a soft dough but not sticky (like pie crust). Knead well; let stand at room temperature, covered, for 30 minutes to 1 hour. Roll dough out 1/8 inch thick on floured board and cut into 3-inch squares. Fry in hot deep fat until brown, dropping or sliding each sopaipilla into the hottest part of the fat. Push sopaipillas down into fat several times for even puffing. Drain on paper towels. If dough has been prepared properly, sopaipillas will "swell" into a 'pillow' shape while frying. Serve with honey as part of the meal or as

Folk tales name tequila as cure to many ailments

By SARAH KESSINGER Arts & Entertainment Editor

Teguila is proven to be more than just a celebrated liquor of Mex-

Far north of the Rio Grande, a little salt, a lime and a bottle of Juarez, Sauza or Jose Cuervo tequila promise an evening of fiesta in Mexico as well as in many parts of the United States. The margarita, tequila with lime juice or sweet and sour mix and triple sec served in a salt-rimmed glass, is a popular beverage although most Mexicans prefer their tequila straight.

Folk stories abound about this drink that leaves its sting after each swig. Some Mexicans say drinking the purest tequila brings forth the ghost of Montezuma, an Aztec leader (as well as evoking his revenge the next day). "A Treasury of Mexican Folkways" by Frances Toor notes that in Mexico, tequila is used to cure many ills. "As a remedy for a cold, one must drink it until he sees double the number of bottles actually before him," the book advises.

Tequila is a clear distilled liquor which contains 40-50 percent alcohol. It was developed when the Spanish introduced distilling in Mexico, although juices from the maguey plants used for tequila were an indigenous drink for centuries before. Some brands of tequila are aged in large oak vats, which mellows the liquor and gives it a light yellowish tint.

The tequila industry was developed on a large scale by the Cuervo family which operated a fermentation business in Tequila, in the state of Jalisco. The Cuervo family continues as a large supplier for the tequila market in Mexico while exporting outside of its borders as well. Tequila comes from the agave plant (a cousin to the maguey) near the village of Tequila. Two of its variations pulque and mezcal are drawn from a cousin to the agave, the maguey

The maguey, a large-leaf, blue-green, aloe-type plant is visible along the roadside in the drier high regions of Mexico.

Pulque, a white milky liquid, comes from the juice of maguey plants. Mezcal is a drink fermented from the hearts of maguey plants in the state of Oaxaca. Mezcal is similar to tequila, but Pulque was once a ceremonial drink of the Aztec tribe, says Toor.

An Aztec goddess represented the maguey plants, and their juice was an offering to the gods. The word tequila originated from "tequitqui," meaning to pay tribute, in the Aztec language, Nahuatl. In Mexican towns and cities "pulquerias" or small saloon-type establishments grow lively in the evenings with laughter and song to the strum of a guitar as patrons drink pulque and swap stories. When served a shot of tequila in many Mexican cantinas, a shot of sangrita, a combination of tomato juice with a slight bit of chile, is commonly served to chase the smarting burn of the liquor.

Education an inalienable right, speaker says

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY Collegian Reporter

While a college education may help students obtain good jobs, it is more important they understand education as an inalienable human right, said an official from the University

"I don't think we should be thinking of education simply as instrumental to getting a good job or helping us be a high-tech society. Thus, we should think of education as a basic human right," said Wilbert J. McKeachie, associate director of the National Center for Research to Improve Post-Secondary Teaching and Learning at the University of Michigan.

McKeachie spoke to faculty and students about improving higher education during the Chester E. Peters Lecture in Student Development Tuesday afternoon in the

He discussed four topics: the goals of education; theories of teaching; barriers to achieving goals; and what teachers can do to improve educational techniques.

By looking at national reports,

McKeachie said there are several different educational goals.

Students need effective writing and speaking skills to be able to communicate and learn from other people, he said. In addition, teachers need to understand insight from different areas and have students integrate these insights into their

The third and perhaps most impor-tant goal is lifelong, self-directed learning, which McKeachie said allows students to continue their education after graduation.

Creative problem-solving techniques can also help students understand values and ethics. Finally, he said, students should develop a personality that will instill selfconfidence.

"The need for these goals is based on a high-tech society," McKeachie said. "The problem is that this is suggesting that education primarily exists for instrumental purposes.'

One of our goals should be to encourage students to have new learning experiences, McKeachie said. Teachers need to challenge students' prejudices, strengthen their love of learning and awaken their sense of wonder about themselves and socie- and socially with one another.

He said there is a need for teachers to understand students' goals and help them reach those goals.

"We need to build bridges between students' goals and teachers' goals, between their present state of knowledge and the state of knowledge teachers have," he said. "College is an institution of learning, not just accumulating knowledge. Teachers and students should learn from each other."

McKeachie said there is a need for students to interact academically

"One thing that makes a difference in our effectiveness as teachers is the degree at which we can keep our students thinking actively, rather than passively absorbing information," he said. "Instead of rewarding students who simply do what we tell them and repeat back what we say, we should reward those students who challenge us.

"Students can learn in ways that will give them the information they will need for an examination and then are quite skilled at forgetting the material once the test is over."

Authorities denounce mandatory AIDS test

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA - Some medical authorities joined gay rights advocates Tuesday in opposing mandatory testing for the AIDS virus, with one expert denouncing tests for all hospital patients as "a dimly disguised maneuver" aimed at eventual forced testing of the entire U.S. population.

Mandatory AIDS tests are "social placebos designed to reassure anxious and frightened people," said Dr. Ron Bayer of New York's Hastings Center. "This is not the time for placebos."

Only widespread changes in sexual behavior and drug use can truly curtail the spread of AIDS, said Bayer, an associate for policy studies at the nonpartisan, nonprofit research organization.

Acquired immune deficiency syndrome, which cripples the body's immune system, is transmitted most frequently by sex or intravenous drug use.

Bayer commented Tuesday on the first day of a two-day conference on AIDS testing sponsored by the national Center for Disease Control. The meeting, originally planned as a discussion for a few dozen experts, attracted hundreds of health officials, medical researchers and activists.

The idea of mandatory AIDS testing for hospital patients, pregnant women and engaged couples was criticized as bad medical policy and legally objectionable by gay rights groups, civil libertarians and medical professionals

CDC researchers said earlier this month that they wanted to hear a variety of opinions on more widespread use of tests for the virus that causes AIDS, including mandatory testing. CDC officials stressed Tuesday that the CDC is an advisory agency and cannot itself dictate health practices to state agencies.

"We're here to discuss the merit or lack of merit - of additional AIDS testing," said CDC Director

James O. Mason. The disease has occurred most often in homosexual men and drug abusers, but heterosexual cases now number 4 percent of the reported 30,000 U.S. cases. More than 17,000 AIDS patients in this country have died. Blood tests to detect AIDS virus have been in use since 1985, most often to screen donated blood. Expanded testing has been advocated as a way of coping with the increasing number of cases spread through heterosexual con-

"Mandatory testing will chase people away," said Jeff Levi, ex-ecutive director of the New Yorkbased National Gay and Lesbian

"The value of testing is the counseling that's associated with it," he said. "This is just a bad public health measure.

Testing will hardly dissuade heterosexuals from practices that transmit the disease, because the number of cases among that group is relatively low, said Dr. H. Hunter Handsfield, director of the Sexually Transmitted Diseases Program in Seattle and a University of Washington pro-

"In heterosexuals...there's still too much denial," he said. "Human beings have trouble conceiving a risk that's less than one

Federal health officials estimate that 1.5 million Americans are infected with the

Although the national infection rate for AIDS virus is an estimated one in 160, rates can be much higher in selected populations - as high as one in nine among men ages 30-39 in the cities hardest hit by AIDS, said Dr. James Curran, director of the AIDS program at the CDC.

College tuition costs outpace inflation Study includes public, private schools

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - A college lobby group released a study Tuesday saying tuition has risen twice as fast as inflation in the 1980s, increasing at nearly a 10 percent-a-year clip on both public and private campuses.

Over the past 16 years, the study said, tuition has gone up at a slower pace than medical care, energy costs and the price of new homes, but faster than the price of food and new

Analysts Arthur Hauptman and Terry Hartle said that since 1970, tuitions have grown by an average 7.8 percent a year, compared to the 6.7 percent annual increase in consumer prices and 8.2 percent growth in disposable personal income.

In the 1970s, tuitions lagged behind the inflation rate, but in the 1980s, tuitions surged ahead, increasing 9.8 percent a year. That is double the 4.9 percent rate of inflation and much faster than the 6.5 percent annual growth in personal incomes over the past six years.

The report was commissioned by the American Council on Education, a lobbying and research group for more than 1,500 colleges and universities. ACE President Robert H. Atwell predicted the tuition spiral will slow down, saying, "I think everybody understands that they cannot continue to increase at twice the rate of inflation.' Hauptman and Hartle said in interviews they believe colleges are not trying hard enough to control costs, and suggested that campuses take a harder look at the productivity of the

"I think colleges can do a lot more, whether it be research universities letting their faculty teach a little bit more" or make better use of technology, said Hauptman, a con-

Hauptman said consumers may start pressuring colleges to let bright students "graduate in three years as a way of cutting costs."

"There's nothing magical about the four years," he said. "Institutions place restrictions on the degree to which students can do it, in part because it means loss of tuition."

Hartle, a fellow at the American Council on Education, said that because colleges have muchof their budgets locked up in long-term contracts for tenured faculty, "they have a flexibility problem in trying to control costs.'

"Are colleges well-run places? My opinion is colleges are conservative organizations. They don't change very rapidly," Hartle said. "They are beginning to look at ways to get their costs under control."

The College Board says it costs $5,604 to attend the average fouryear public college this year, including $1,337 in tuition, and $10,199. at four-year private campuses, including $5,793 in tuition. College costs went up 6.9 percent in this past year at a time when consumer prices rose less than 2 percent. Several Ivy League schools and other elite institutions have already announced 6 percent increases for this fall.

The report said, "Some, elite schools have discovered that they can increase tuition with no appreciable effect on the number or quality of their applicants." That is no different, it said, than "what happened to the price of Japanese cars in the early 1980s, when the supply of that desirable product was restricted by import quotas.'

The report said the "good news" about college prices is that "over the long term, the growth in college prices appears to be only slightly higher than the increase in consumer prices." Consumer prices rose 182 percent between 1970 and 1986, while tuitions rose 232 percent. Disposable personal income went up 253 percent. Median family income grew by 187

"The bad news," it said, "is that college tuitions are rising much more rapidly in the 1980s than the prices for other goods and services."

Since 1970, public college tuitions have gone up 7.5 percent a year, private 8.4 percent.

Professor to receive $1 million

By The Collegian Staff

A professor of microbiology has received a national grant of about $1 million to continue his research on blemishes, skin diseases and various other infections caused by bacteria.

The National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Disease has renewed John Iandolo's five-year grant for $464,000. Iandolo said he will learn the amount of the Merit Award, an additional guaranteed five-year fund, in the next three to five years.

Iandolo's research involves the staph infection, one of the most common bacteriums in humans and animals. Infections caused by the bacterium include skin blemishes, scald skin disease, food poisoning and toxic shock syndrome.

"The research is advancing our understanding of the way this organism regulates the production of toxins," Iandolo said. These findings are important if scientists are to discover ways to control the bacterium, he said.

Iandolo has four graduate students and a full-time technician assisting

Although the University does not have all the facilities necessary to conduct the research, Iandolo said they have used equipment at other universities, including the University of Oklahoma, University of Kansas, Iowa State University and Creighton University in Omaha,

"(The total award) can only be a plus," he said, adding that K-State is the only university in Kansas to receive this type of funding for biological research.

"This is just recognition that there are people at K-State who are firstclass scientists."

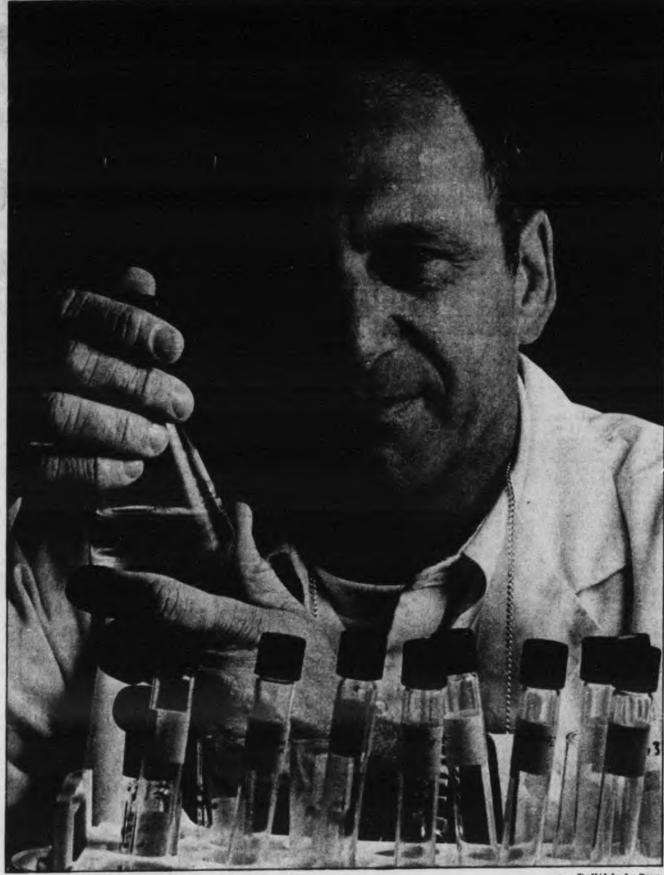

K-State was already visible, but this award maintains K-State's high visibility on the national and international level, he said.

Iandolo said he was flabbergasted that his grant had been renewed. Out of the current seven-year grant Iandolo has, the amount for the three previous years totaled $223,530, he said.

The institute receives more than 8,000 proposals each year, 15 percent of which are accepted or renewed every year. To receive a grant extension, one must submit a progress report on the previous research. One of the institute's committees reviews the pro-

The individual committees have two main criteria: the qualility of the research and whether or not the research is worthy of continued fun-

Chernobyl fallout not linked to fewer births, official says

By The Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia - Nine months after the Chernobyl nuclear plant disaster, the number of births in Zagreb was 40 percent lower than usual, a medical professor was quoted as saying Tuesday.

Iva Kuvacic of Zagreb University told the Vecernje Novosti newspaper that it was impossible to link the drop in births directly to the April 1986 nuclear accident in the Soviet Union. "What is quite certain, however, is about 40 percent fewer births than in previous years," he said. He added, "evidently, (some) women sought not to get pregnant in this period. If they did, they decided that these days we have been having to get abortions. Zagreb, the capital of Croatia, is about 730 miles southwest of Cher-

Yugoslav officials insisted radiation emitted by the Chernobyl accident did not affect Yugoslavia's crops, Common Market countries sharply reduced their imports from the Balkan nation for a while.

For two months after the accidents, residents of Yugoslavia were cautioned not to eat lettuce, strawberries and other fruit and vegetables unless they could be peeled or washed thoroughly.

Abortions are legal in Yugoslavia, virtually cost-free and easily obtainable. Birth defects can be caused by radiation, and abortion is sometimes advised by doctors when a pregnant woman is exposed to excess radiation.

MU stands in way of Lady Cats' title hopes

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

With destiny in its grasp, the K-State women's basketball team is confident it can win a share of the Big Eight Conference title.

First, they have to get by conference-leading Missouri at 7:30 p.m. tonight in the regular season home finale at Ahearn Field House.

K-State, 19-7 overall and 8-5 in the conference, will also look to win its 15th straight at home. The Lady Cats are 12-0 at home this season.

"We're going to beat Missouri and we're going to be just like we were our freshman year," said senior Leiding is referring to the 1983-84 season, when the Lady Cats went 25-6. That year they also won the Big Eight tournament and advanced to the NCAA Midwest Regional before losing to Northeast Louisiana.

Missouri, 19-7 and 9-4, can win the title outright with a win against the Lady Cats. But if K-State wins, there will be a three-way tie with Kansas for the crown.

Kansas, 16-12 and 9-5, kept its title shot alive with a 65-62 win over Colorado Tuesday in Lawrence. Nebraska, which was tied with K-State, was bombarded 97-74 by Oklahoma State at Stillwater.

ed to foul.

"It's still the Big Eight championship," said K-State coach Matilda Mossman, "whether it be one team or four teams that win it. It's pretty simple. This game is for the conference championship."

Both Missouri and K-State received a vote in the latest Associated Press women's basketball poll.

Shooting star Renee Kelly will lead the Lady Tigers on offense. She averages 25.7 points per game and is second in rebounding with 9.8 caroms per game.

Kelly scored 24 points in the first meeting between the teams, helping the Lady Tigers to a 78-74 win over K-State. Lady Cat Susan Green was called for a technical foul with 13 seconds remaining in the contest, allowing Misssouri to take the lead and gain control of the ball.

"We know Renee is going to get her points," Mossman said. "We just have to keep her from having an exceptional night."

The Lady Cats can't concentrate on Kelly, Mossman said, because the rest of the starting lineup is performing much better than earlier in the year.

Rounding out the starting rotation for Missouri is 6-foot-1 forward Renee Dozier (5.1 points and 2.7 rebounds per game); 5-10 forward Monique Lucas (9.3 points and 4.3 rebounds); 5-8 guard Maggie LeValley (8.8 points and 4.4 rebounds); and 5-7 guard Renay Daugherty (6.9 points and 1.3 rebounds).

Although the Lady Cats may not have a scoring machine like Kelly, they do have four starters who average double figures.

Leiding paces K-State with 15.5 points per game. Green is netting 12.1 points, Carlisa Thomas averages 11.7 and Tracey Bleczinski hits 10.2 points per game.

Thomas leads the Lady Cats on the boards, grabbing 10.1 boards per game. She is second on the Big Eight rebounding list with 10.5 rebounds per game in conference play.

Wildcats blow big lead as Tigers escape, 80-75

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

Twelve players, five coaches and most of the 10,380 fans at Ahearn Field House watched jubilation turn into dejection Tuesday, as K-State lost to the Missouri Tigers, 80-75.

K-State, 17-9 overall and 7-6 in conference play, let a 13-point, second-half lead gradually wither away before being defeated by five points. It was the Wildcats' fourth Big Eight loss by five points or less.

"It's awfully disappointing," K-State coach Lon Kruger said. "We battled pretty good there for 35 minutes. We just didn't step up and make any effort to make any plays when they chopped into that lead."

K-State dominated Missouri, 20-9 and in first in the conference at 10-3, for most of the game. Early on, the 'Cats exhibited the fire and enthusiasm Kruger has been looking for

Missouri's basketball team shares victor's spotlight with car winner

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

The Missouri basketball had to share the winner's spotlight after last night's K-State-Tigers matchup in Ahearn Field House.

Steve Packebush, senior in agricultural economics, was chosen at random to take a shot at winning a new Ford Thunderbird, part of a halftime promotion sponsored by Dick Edwards Ford in Manhattan.

Packebush did something no one else has done in the 2-year-old event: He won.

"I can't believe I did that,"

Packebush said. His performance consisted of making a layup and a free throw, and shots from the top of the key and half court in less than 30

"I played in an intramural game just before tonight's game and I was shooting terribly, like one for five. I finally just stopped shooting," he

Much to his surprise, Packebush was again shooting, but this time for a greater reward.

'On the first shot - the layup - I clutched and missed," he said. "But that just took the pressure off." Packebush made the layup on his second try, then proceeded to knock off the free throw and top of the key shots in succession.

With 11 seconds left on the shot clock, he missed his first attempt from half court. The ball was promptly fed back to him by promotion assistants for the winner with seven seconds left.

"(My friends and I) joke around sometimes and shoot like were shooting for the car, but I never made the half-court shot," Packebush said. "I have said that if I made the shot to win the car I would fall down on center court."

He did. Right in the middle of

was ecstatic over Packebush's performance. "Can you believe that?" Travis said. "The last home game of the year and he makes the shot that wins the car. Packebush, who owns a 1981 Buick Regal, isn't sure what he's going to do with the new car. "(The Regal) was supposed to last a long time," he said. "I'll talk to my parents tonight and see what they have to say.'

Packebush said he has a test this morning and he planned to call his instructor to see if there was some way for him to get out of it.

"I was going to study for the test," he said. "But now I'm going to blow it off and party.'

Schafer's buzzer shot kills 12th-ranked OU

By The Associated Press

AMES, Iowa - Tom Schafer picked the perfect time to play the best game of his Iowa State University basketball career.

In his final home game, the 6-foot-7 senior hit a lunging, 14-foot shot at the buzzer to finish with a career-high 29 points and give the Cyclones an 86-84 upset of 12th-ranked Oklahoma in Big Eight Conference play Tuesday

"I felt pretty good about the way it went off," Schafer said of his game-winner. "I got it up there on the rim where I knew it had a chance to go in. I knew it wasn't going to be short."

Iowa State, which overcame a 16-point first-half deficit, got a chance to win the game when Oklahoma's Tim McCalister shot an airball from 3-point range with six seconds left.

The Cyclones called timeout with two seconds remaining to set up their final play and Gary Thompkins inbounded the ball to Schafer, who took one dribble to his right and banked in his clutch shot from just inside the free throw line. It was the second major upset in as many weeks for Iowa State, which defeated then 15th-ranked Kansas 95-86 a week ago Tuesday.

Polls shun women's teams in Big Eight Miami (Fla.), Louisville, Notre Tennessee ranked in both polls -

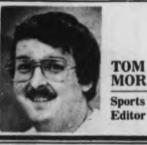

We've said it before, and we'll say it again: Women's basketball teams in the Big Eight Conference just don't get the respect they deserve.

So, move over Rodney Dangerfield. Make way for the women of the Big Eight.

K-State and Missouri will battle for at least a share of the conference title Wednesday night in Ahearn Field House, and each received one vote in the latest Associated Press poll, released Tuesday.

The Lady Tigers received a mention in USA Today's Top 25 basketball rankings. K-State was snubbed. That's rubbish.

There are teams that truly deserve to be ranked in the respective polls, such as Long Beach State, James Madison and Louisiana Tech. These schools have always had strong women's programs, and each can lay claim to being one of the three most about. With the exception of the Southeastern Conference - which has Auburn, Georgia, Mississippi, there might not be a tougher women's conference than the Big The Lady Cats are 19-7 overall with five of those losses coming in Big Eight play. Missouri, also at 19-7, has dropped four conference match-ups. Just how tough is it to win in the conference? Oklahoma, at 17-9 overall, is seventh in league play at 5-8. Four teams with worse overall records - Colorado, Oklahoma State, Kansas and Nebraska - are ranked above the Lady Sooners.

Kansas men's basketball coach Larry Brown made a comment recently about the Big Eight that could easily apply to the women's Brown was commenting on a tough Jayhawks' non-conference schedule, which included games against Pittsburgh, Ohio State, Wichita State, Dame and St. John's. "It's been a real tough schedule, but I think playing against Big Eight teams prepares us for that," Brown

In the men's rankings, pollsters tend to side with teams that are traditionally strong. But, never fail, there is always a Cleveland State or an Arkansas-Little Rock that is ignored during the regular season and then makes a big splash in the NCAA tournament.

The same applies to the women's rankings. Perhaps it would help if the pollsters thought like Vaughn, who says "basketball is basketball."

"The game is the same, the drills are the same...the team attitude...it's all the same," Vaughn said. "It's basketball. It doesn't matter where you play it or who you play it with."

testified that "the ultimate lesson of Chernobyl is that human and technological error can cause a disaster anywhere, any time."

"At the very least, nuclear power plants should not be permitted to operate in the vicinity of crowded communities where evacuation is impossible and where casualties from an accident would be immense," he said.

Cuomo said the NRC proposal would be a "repudiation" of promises made by President Reagan in 1984. In a letter to a Republican congressional candidate, Reagan said, "This administration does not favor the imposition of federal authority over the objections of state and local governments in matters regarding the adequacy of an emergency evacuation plan for a nuclear power plant."

Cuomo labeled as "absurd" the assumption that state and local governments could effectively evacuate nearby residents in an emergency without prior planning, training and testing.

"It is like saying you can fight a major naval battle with no map, no battle plan, no reliable logistic support and no previous training of officers and sailors," he said. "You wouldn't even play a football game that way."

New York's two senators, Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Republican Alfonse D'Amato, both said they will try to get Congress to override the NRC if the current requirements are changed.

Commission Chairman Lando Zech said "the NRC has had a long and successful history of cooperating with state and local governments" in issues involving nuclear safety.

un stressed that the rules change "only deals with the unusual situation where the state and local governments have chosen not to participate in emergency planning."

The NRC's staff, headed by executive director Victor Stello, proposed earlier this month that the rules be changed to allow the utilities themselves to draw up emergency plans if state and local authorities fail to cooperate.

Zech has argued that the emergency planning rule, adopted in the wake of the Three Mile Island accident in Pennsylvania in 1979 was never intended to dilute federal supremacy over the regulation of the nuclear power industry.

Zech, in recent weeks, has told committees of Congress that he has no doubt that state and local authorities would fulfill their responsibilties in an emergency, regardless of their pre-licensing declarations.

Current rules call for the establishment of an "emergency planning zone" ensuring the rapid shelter or evacuation of residents within 10 miles of a nuclear plant.

Officials seek hospital probe

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - After meeting privately with federal authorities responsible for decertifying the Winfield State Hospital, members of two legislative subcommittees decided Tuesday to seek an emergency audit to investigate problems which led to patient abuse and employee intimidation at the facility. Later, Sen. Wint Winter, R-Lawrence and chairman of the Senate panel responsible for handling the budgets of state hospitals, announced he would hold hearings next week on the possibility of reshaping the state's philosophy for treating the mentally retarded

Winter said his inquest would include taking the Senate and House subcommittees on a tour of the embattled Winfield facility and the Parsons State Hospital on March 6. "I'm going to hold hearings on the fundamental question of whether our current system of treating the mentally retarded is appropriate," Winter said. "I want to know if we have the right people at the right hospitals or maybe if our hospitals are too big.

"We'll look at possible capital improvements and at the possibility of placing more emphasis and money in community health centers.

"I'm not sure we can't find a system that works better than what we have now.'

Besides the legislative activities Tuesday, Gerald T. Hannah, commissioner of mental health and retardation services for the state welfare agency in Topeka, was busy implementing new reporting procedures at three other state hospitals for the mentally retarded.

George Vega, assistant for Hannah, said his boss spoke by conference call with the superintendents of state hospitals in Parsons, Norton and the Kansas Neurological Institute in Topeka.

Hannah briefed the three on the status of Winfield's bid for federal recertification and explained the new abuse-reporting system to be implemented statewide.

Vega also reported that each of the 466 residents at Winfield will receive daily physical examinations by registered nurses to check for signs of injuries, accidents or abuse. Any unreported or unexplained injuries will be reported immediately.

The two committees met early Tuesday for about an hour with three federal health officials from the Department of Health and Human Services in Kansas City, Mo.: John L. Swetnam, acting associate regional administrator for health standards and quality; Jim Rice and Judith Saale, who performed the final audit and hand-wrote the decertification papers late last Wednes-

At the meeting, Swetnam said he informed the four lawmakers in attendance about a letter disclosed Monday in which federal investigators accused administrators at Winfield of ignoring and possibly trying to cover up abuse of patients.

Also, Swetnam said he briefed lawmakers on problems unrelated to patient abuse and employee intimidation which also must be corrected before he can restore Winfield's lost certification, and the $700,000 in monthly federal Medicaid funding which accompanies the

"We were there because they invited us to come," Swetnam said. "We filled them in on some of the problems we found.

'We outlined the things in the letter regarding the immediate and serious situation related to abuse. In addition, we shared with them information about problems at Winfield in the area of active treatment which also will have to be corrected before the facility can be recertified.' Swetnam said state officials can expect another letter, late this week or early next, which will outline all the treatment problems existing at Winfield.

Those attending the meeting were Reps. Sandy Duncan, R-Wichita; Jack Shriver, D-Arkansas City; Duane Goossen, R-Goessel; and Sen. Richard Gannon, D-Goodland. Winter did not attend the meeting.

Duncan, chairman of the House budget panel's subcommittee, said the lawmakers met in private because "confidential personnel matters about specific individual employees" were discussed.

"We're trying to find out what went wrong with our reporting system, how we can make it better and prevent this from occurring in the future," Duncan said.

Shriver said he asked the federal officials to meet with them and called it a "very positive visit."

"They told us their job is not to condemn or point blame at the state or the hospital administration," Shriver said. "It's not their job to criticize, only to look at our programs and decide if they meet certification requirements.

Duncan said the Legislative Post

Audit Committee would be asked Wednesday to conduct an emergency audit of the Winfield facility to determine "what broke down and how we can correct it." Duncan said he hoped the legislative auditor would be able to dispatch an audit team to the site immediately and return with at least a preliminary report by

"From what the federal officials told us, it appears there was a small number of employees involved in actual hard-core abuse," Duncan said. "It also appears there was a lack of support for those reporting abuse from the hospital administration.'

However, Duncan gave no specific numbers of employees or details of the abuse. That type of information is expected to be revealed Friday at a news conference called by Dr. Robert Harder, secretary of the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services.

"We had a frank discussion and I came away feeling good about the situation," Duncan said of the morning meeting with Swetnam. "We tried to impress on them that we are very concerned about the patients. Our No. 1 concern is to provide a clean, safe, decent living environment and protect the health of our patients and staff.'

Gannon said the meeting produced a "good exchange of thoughts and ideas" and said there were no attacks or pointing of fingers by the federal authorities.

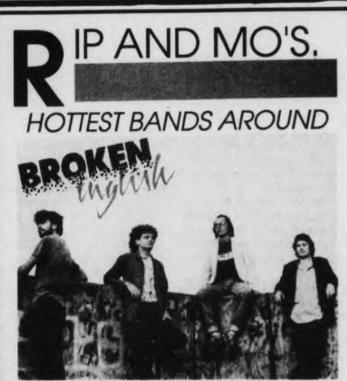

"Their major concern was about a breakdown in the abuse-reporting system," Gannon said. "The people directly involved didn't have access so they could report to higher-ups.'

Woody Allen's 'Radio Days' humorous yet not his finest

By GARY JOHNSON Collegian Reviewer

Woody Allen's "Radio Days" vividly recreates the era when radios were the center of every household a time when the music of Harry James, Tommy Dorsey and Benny Goodman drifted from open win-

Film Review

It was a time for super heroes (The Masked Avenger) and adventurers (Biff Baxter), and it was a time for radio soap operas and Breakfast Club chats with the stars.

Like Neil Simon's "Brighton Beach Memoirs" (a similar but inferior film), "Radio Days" uses an offscreen, adult narrator (Woody Allen) to tell us what it was like growing up the youngest son of a Jewish family in New York City. But whereas the narrator of "Brighton Beach Memoirs" suffered through the awkwardness of adolescent lust, the "Radio Days" narrator is only 10 years old when the story takes place.

This means Allen's film is largely about the difference between a child's and an adult's view of the world. For when Allen was a boy, nothing was quite as important as the Masked Avenger secret compartment ring, and nothing was quite as surprising as finding out his substitute teacher was the same lady had seen, with the help of binoculars, dance nude in front of her bedroom mirror.

And no one's word was quite as good as Biff Baxter's (a radio host who tells the boys and girls to search the sky and the coast for Nazi planes and submarines). It's a time when anything is possible.

But the movie isn't only about the young Allen. It's also about everyone in his family - from his Uncle Abe (Josh Mostel), who carries home fish every day; to his father (Michael Tucker) and mother (Julie Kavner), who he has never seen kiss, except once; to a not-too-intelligent cigarette girl (Mia Farrow), who gets locked on a roof while making out with a married man. All these characters, and many others, are pulled together by the narrator to create a wonderfully picturesque vision of life in America during World War II - a time when women (because of the nylon shortage) painted nylon stockings on their legs. time when searchlights scanned

But for all the painstaking attention to detail, "Radio Days" is not nearly as compelling as Allen's last film, "Hannah and Her Sisters." The film has such a large cast of characters that we never really get to know any one character in depth - not even the narrator himself.

"Hannah and Her Sisters" had a large cast as well, but every scene in that movie told us something crucial about their lives. "Radio Days" is a series of vignettes - some of which are important, while others are arbitrarily chosen. The Sally White (Mia Farrow) character, for example, is only weakly linked to the other characters in the movie.

At its best "Radio Days" is a very funny film. In fact, it might be the funniest Woody Allen film since "Annie Hall," but unlike his other films, it's almost all atmosphere. But what an atmosphere! It's a New York filled with glowing neon signs, a New York where the movie theaters are palaces, complete with marble staircases and chandeliers. It's a town where radio stars perform from studios decked in Art Deco splendor.

Even with its weaknesses, "Radio Days" is still a genuinely charming film. It doesn't represent Woody Allen at his best, but nonetheless, it's much more satisfying than virtually any other contemporary comedy.

Board blames Reagan in arms sale

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Tower commission Thursday rebuked President Reagan for failing to control his national security staff in a tough report that said the president's decision to sell arms to Iran "rewarded a regime that clearly supported terrorism and hostage-taking."

The president's concept of his arms-to-Iran policy "was not accurately reflected in the reality" of the operation, the report said. Its principal author described Reagan as "a little too aloof from the implementation of policy.' The three-member panel, chosen by Reagan himself, provided sharp and sometimes detailed criticism of key aides, including chief of staff Donald Regan, former CIA Director William J. Casey, former National Security Adviser John Poindexter and National Security Council staffer Oliver North, who was fired last November.

Regan, expected to resign within days, bears "primary responsibility for the chaos that descended upon the White House" after the affair was disclosed, and Poindexter "failed grievously" by not telling the president about the diversion of arms money to Nicaraguan rebels. the report said.

The board estimated that Iran overpaid $3 million for arms in 1985 and nearly $20 million in 1986, and "Sizable sums of money generated by the arms sales to Iran remain unaccounted for."

The panel said Israel played a major role in keeping the Iranian initiative going because it wanted to promote its arms export industry, strengthen Iran against Israel's adversary, Iraq, and establish Israel as the only real strategic partner of the United States in the Middle East.

"With such a complex, high-risk operation, and so much at stake," in the Iran dealings, "the president should have ensured that the NSC system did not fail him. He did not force his policy to undergo the most critical review of which the NSC participants and the process was capable. At no time did he insist on accountability or performance review." "The president made mistakes," said former Sen. John Tower, R-Texas, the chairman of the special review board that spent three months investigating the secret sale of weapons to Iran and the diversion of profits to the Contra rebels.

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers said the report provided evidence of the weakness of Reagan's management style and Tower, responding to a question at a news conference. said, "You can say this president holds himself a little too aloof from the implementation of policy." Reagan was "poorly advised and poorly served" by many of his aides, Tower added.

Marine Lt. Col North was described as working practically in isolation on both the Iran policy and on efforts of questionable legality to raise funds to support the Nicaraguan Contra rebels. The Tower commission said Iranian arms funds were diverted to the Contras, and that North's reliance on "private intermediaries, businessmen and other financial brokers, private operators and Iranians hostile to the United States ... invited kickbacks and payoffs."

Reagan's policy of selling arms to Iran created an incentive for further hostage-taking, violated the U.S. arms embargo, and threatened to upset the military balance between Iran and Iraq, the

Kansas congressmen say shakeup needed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Kansans in Congress agreed Thursday on the need for a staff shakeup at the White House to correct policymaking flaws identified in the Tower Commission's report of the Iran arms affair.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said "colossal blunders" were made by the Reagan administration. Although saying it's the "president's call," Dole suggested that White House Chief of Staff Donald Regan should resign.

"It would seem to me if you don't protect the president, you don't serve the president well.

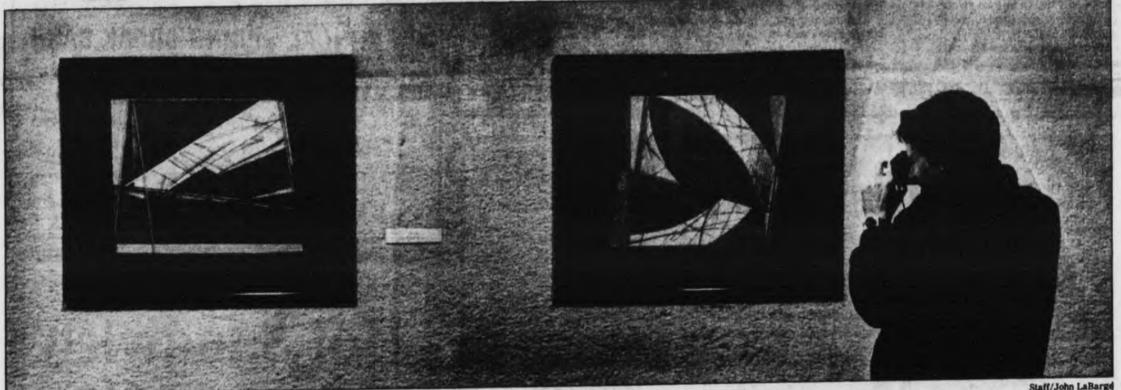

Then you ought to move on," Dole said at a news conference.

Dole as well as Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., and Rep. Dan Glickman, D-Kan., said it was vital that Reagan quickly demonstrate to the American public that he is in firm control of the government.

"If it doesn't cause the president to reorganize his staff quickly and to create the perception that he is not delegating everything, then he is irreparably harmed and he will finish his presidency a failure," Glickman said.

Kassebaum also warned that

Faculty artists display talent in Union art gallery

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

Three variations of art multimedia, coil technique, and acrylic on canvas and handmade paper - reflect the large array of talent in the Art Department Faculty Show Feb. 23 through March 6 in the Union Art Gallery.

The four artists displaying work are Diane Dollar, instructor of art, David L. Harmes, instructor of art, Yoshiro Ikeda, associate professor of art, and Roger Rouston, assistant professor of art.

Both Dollar and Harmes have multimedia designs that are variations of different media

Dollar has been at K-State for 20 years. Her display consists of eight photographs of houses, embellished with oil paints to create variations of different media. "I discovered the photos of the houses last semester, so I had a way to deal with tight realism - the thought interested me," Dollar said. In Dollar's work, images of dead people are sketched and outlined in white paint on the roof of the house or on the front doorstep.

When people die, their bodies are outlined by police and investigators with white paint, Dollar said. The outlines represent the absence of life for people and things.

"The pictures are a negative perspective, but are color 'candycoated' to illustrate the pretty, pretty world being eaten up," she said. "People let their lives be managed without noticing a 'creeping evil' coming and poisoning the air."

Dollar's 'creeping evil' is represented by a series of white dots that cover her photographs. A creeping evil varies from person to person. but many do not realize it or are unwilling to take a stand on their opi-

Harmes has been at K-State for nearly nine years. He started as a graphic designer for extension ser-

Harmes said his artwork is a result of his new interest in figurative primitive art. The images are airbrushed onto a tissue-like rice paper known as Japanese midggen.

"I wanted to make a transition into other areas with more color, and the airbrush allows the delicate tones and vibrations of colors to come through layers of images," Harmes

Harmes said the airbrush is a more personal medium of figure and

"The images are festive and bright with more illustrations of colors, emotions and expressions," he said. "I'm not trying to deceive anyone with my images. I want to excite through my images and draw atten-

In the future, Harmes plans to make tapestries and large wall pieces based on his collection at the gallery.

Harmes recently received national recognition with a series of older work titled "Cathy's World." The series was accepted at the Boston 39th Printmake Exhibit.

Ikeda, who came to the University in 1978, finished his artwork for the gallery display during Christmas break. It usually takes him one day on the average to complete his coil technique pottery. A coil technique requires different oxides and chemical stains for its construction, he said.

Ikeda enjoys this type of art because he does not have actual control over his finished product. "It's a surprise that differs with

Committee tables bill on tuition

By JUDY LUNDSTROM Collegian Reporter

A bill proposing to increase K-State tuition by 20 percent was tabled Thursday in the Kansas House Appropriations Committee.

The proposal, introduced to the committee Wednesday by Rep. Robert Vancrum, R-Overland Park, would set the minimum fee-cost ratio at 20 percent for Kansas students and 60 percent for non-resident students, said Mark Tallman, director of legislative affairs for Associated Students of Kansas.

The fee-cost ratio is the amount students pay in tuition to fund the total cost of education compared with the amount the state pays. Education costs include faculty salaries, library support, academic computing and operating expenses.

Currently, tuition funds an average of 25 percent of the total cost of education, while the state pays the remaining 75 percent, Tallman said.

An informal policy in effect since 1966 sets the overall fee-cost ratio at Board of Regents schools at 25 percent, he said. However, some variation exists within those guidelines. Tuition at the University of Kansas funds about 30 percent of the total cost of education, while at Emporia State, Pittsburg State and Fort Hays State universities the fee-cost ratio is about 20 percent, Tallman said. Wichita State University students pay about 25 percent.

He said KU's ratio is higher because it has more out-of-state and graduate students.

Both ASK and the Regents testified

Service groups may temporarily accept 'unfair' support fee

By PAT HUND Campus Editor and CHAD L. SANBORN

Staff Writer Student and faculty representatives of three University agencies met with administration officials in the Union Thursday to discuss the strategy and planning of the proposed institutional support fee. Although representatives from Student Publications Inc., the Union and Lafene Student Health Center tentatively agreed to support the fee this year, they maintained that while the University does provide services to the agencies, the agencies also provide the University with services.

The three agencies and four others will be charged a 3 percent institutional support fee based on their total income revenue, except the Union and the Department of Housing, which will have a 1.5 percent rate levied because they already pay for their own utilities.

Representatives of the agencies and administration officials disagreed on how many Big Eight universities already have a support

Six Big Eight universities are currently being assessed some type of administrative overhead charge, according to a Jan. 12 letter signed by University President Jon Wefald. The letter was sent to agency directors and administration officials representing the agencies affected by the institutional support fee.

"All of our peer institutions and six of our sister Big Eight institutions currently charge an institutional support fee (or general administrative overhead) to auxiliaries and self-funded units," the letter stated.

However, some agency representatives disputed some of these

Dave Adams, director of Student Publications, said he called representatives from Oklahoma State University and University of Nebraska, who have positions similar to his, about administrative overhead charges. Adams said the two people had never heard of such a

"They (the representatives) had never paid anything like this fee. They wanted to know where the figures came from," he said.

Mark Buyle, junior in marketing and chairman of Union Governing Board, said the University of Colorado is the only Big Eight university with an administrative overhead

"Colorado has had it for years,"

Buyle said. George Miller, vice president of administration and finance, said the information sheet was prepared by John Moore, assistant vice president of administration and finance, but he is not sure where the exact figures came from.

He did, however, offer an explanation for the other university representatives' unfamiliarity with the fee. "Each university is different," Miller said. "Not every student health center pays a fee. Not every student publication pays a fee. Clearly, each university has a different arrangement. But there is, in one way or another, integral input by these institutions." The representatives decided to stand behind their argument that the fee is unfair because the agencies and the University currently exchange services for services. "In the past, the situation has always been that our services are equal to the services provided by the University. Now they are saying that is not so," Buyle said.

Buyle said the fee will cause prices at the Union and Student Publications to rise, and in turn, the students will be paying higher prices. Miller agreed, saying in order to maintain University funds, the agencies may have to raise their service prices.

"You (the agencies) may have to think about charging for services that are now free. Or if you sell something for less than cost, you

Soviets resume weapons testing

MOSCOW - The Soviet Union detonated its first nuclear explosion in 19 months Thursday and said it was forced to resume testing because the United States refused to go along with a Kremlin moratorium on weapons tests.

The explosion under the steppe in remote Kazakhstan was announced by the Soviet news agency Tass. The rapid announcement was highly unusual and appeared intended to underscore the Kremlin's contention that continued American testing required a resumption of Soviet tests.

"I want to stress once more that the termination of the moratorium was a forced measure dictated by security interests only," said Maj. Gen. Gely Batenin, a Defense Ministry spokesman.

But at a special news conference on the test, he said, "The resumption of nuclear explosions by the Soviet Union does not mean that it has abandoned its struggle for the complete cessation of such tests.

"A historic chance for ending nuclear tests once and for all has been missed," Batenin added.

Health club shooting spree kills 1

WICHITA - One man was killed and three other people were wounded Thursday night when a gunman walked into a fitness center and opened fire with a large-caliber pistol, police said.

The dead man was identified as Michael R. Turnbull, 18, of Carbondale Lt. Mike McKenna said one of the victims, identified as Lynn Nicholson, 35, was listed in serious condition at St. Joseph Medical Center with a stomach wound. The other two were not seriously injured. William R. Neal, 26, suffered a superficial thigh wound and was released after treatment at a hospital. Jerrod B. Kackley, 13, suffered a superficial hand wound and did not require hospital treatment, police said.

McKenna said the assailant presented a membership card, signed the register and was admitted to the health club on Wichita's southeast side at about 7:15 p.m.

McKenna said the man walked about six feet from the check-in desk, put down a black handbag he was carrying and removed a pistol. Witnesses reported the man knelt down and fired into the exercise room.

Commission opposes waste site

MANHATTAN - A petition opposing a suggestion for a nuclear waste disposal site west of Manhattan was endorsed Thursday by the Riley County Commissioners.

The petition presented to the commission bore over 300 signatures from people opposing the plan advanced by Robert Clack, a retired nuclear engineering professor at K-State.

Clack, who once ran for governor and has just started a monthly publication to air his conservative political views, has proposed the nuclear waste disposal site as part of a strategy to bring the Superconducting Super Collider to Kansas.

The collider, or SSC, is a $4 billion project for the study of fundamental physics through a large buried tunnel in which two proton beams would be made to collide. Many states are expected to compete for the project, which would employ 2,500 people.

Clack met recently with Gov. Mike Hayden to outline his proposal for having a low-level radioactive waste storage facility established as a demonstration project on what used to be K-State's nuclear

Tests show 2,100 exposed to AIDS

WASHINGTON - The Pentagon, more than halfway through screening active-duty military personnel for AIDS, had identified about 2,100 men and women who have been exposed to the deadly disease, knowledgeable sources say.

Those results, when added to the tallies from the testing of recruits, mean the Defense Department's 17-month screening program has now found more than 3,000 people who tested positive for

Moreover, the department - which already runs the most extensive AIDS testing program in the world — is now debating whether testing should be extended to civilian employees, the sources added.

The new figures on testing were compiled Wednesday when Pentagon officials agreed to discuss screening results for active-duty

The Pentagon now routinely reports the results of its AIDS screening for new recruits. But the department has yet to release any results on the testing of personnel already on active duty, despite more than a year of testing.

According to the sources, who asked not to be identified, the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps have now tested almost 1.3 million, or 62 percent, of the 2.1 million men and women currently on

Of that total, some 2,100 tested positively for exposure to the disease, the officials said.

Food ads mislead, group charges

WASHINGTON - New McDonald's advertising, which emphasizes nutrition, is misleading to consumers who eat at the fast-food restaurant chain, a consumer group charged Thursday.

Michael Jacobson, of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, charged that new advertising focusing on nutritional content fails to deal with the large amount of calories, fat, sodium and sugar in the company's products.

The ads may mislead many customers, Jacobson said in a letter to Ed Rensi, president of McDonalds.

McDonald's spokeswoman Stephanie Skurdy said the new advertising campaign was carefully prepared and the company believes it is Skurdy said the new ads represent a long-term commitment on the part of the nation's largest fast food chain, "an effort by McDonald's to inform our customers about the nutritional value of our products." Jacobson, who heads the independent, nutrition-oriented consumer group, said he would prefer it if "McDonald's would make as great an effort to improve its food as its image." Jacobson did applaud the company for introducing salads at its restaurants, reducing the sodium content in foods and switching to vegetable oil for frying chicken and fish.

Two refuse offer of Regan's post

WASHINGTON - President Reagan, searching for a successor for embattled White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan, was unable to get two of his closest associates, Drew Lewis and Paul Laxalt, to take the post, it was revealed Thursday night.

Both Lewis and Laxalt took themselves out of the running for the job late Thursday as speculation grew that Regan's departure was An administration source, who declined to be identified, told The Associated Press that in recent days Lewis, who served as Reagan's transportation secretary, withdrew his name from consideration when the job was proferred.

A Lewis spokesman, Harvey Turner, said in a telephone interview rom New York that he would have no comment on the report.

TOPEKA — Retail liquor store owners in Kansas were free Thursday to set whatever prices they want on liquor and wine after U.S. District Judge Richard D. Rogers struck down as unconstitutional Kansas' liquor minimum price markup law.

The judge ruled the 1961 law violates the federal Sherman Antitrust Act, and ordered the state to stop enforcing it immediately.

The decision was announced from the bench after Rogers listened to arguments in a lawsuit brought by Attorney General Robert T. Stephan challenging validity of the law.

Rogers said the Kansas law was so similar to one in the state of New York that recently was declared unconstitutional by the U.S. Supreme Court that it could not be allowed to stand.

Rogers said the state law "is a virtual mirror of the system that existed in the state of New York," and said he was unable to find from the evidence presented in briefs and oral arguments by attorneys representing the attorney general's office and the Revenue Department "any distinguishable factors that would allow it to be declared constitutional.'

John Lamb, ABC director who was one of the defendants in the friendly lawsuit to determine constitutionality, said he knows of no price restraints on liquor retail dealers since the law has been abolished.

However, Lamb said he wants liquor retailers to be prohibited from selling liquor and wine below cost, so Kansas doesn't experience a rash of cut throat competition that could be detrimental to consumers in the long term.

"We're trying to research whether they can sell below acquisition cost," Lamb said. "I don't know of a statute that would prevent it. I don't think there is

Lamb said his concern is that criminal elements could backroll liquor stores, cut prices drastically to drive out legitimate competition and then raise prices back up once the competition is eliminated - and gouge con-

"You could get yourself a pretty good little deal going in that way," said Lamb. "I think it encourages corruption."

Judge Rogers said the Kansas law might have been legal if it met two tests for exempting state laws from application of the Sherman Act. But, he said, it only met one of those tests.

The Kansas law is the declared public policy of the state and was intended to serve a public purpose, which was to hold down consumption of alcohol by having all retail stores sell spirits and wine at the same minimum price.

However, the judge added, the state law does not meet a second test of the Sherman Act, and that is active state supervision of the minimum price markup law. He said in Kansas it was only 'passive" supervision.

"The facts clearly show the state does not actively supervise the system of minimum price markup," the judge said. He noted the Alcoholic Beverage Control board has changed the minimum markup on wine just once in the last 10 years and has not changed the markup on spirits even once in that time period. He also said the board makes no regular study of liquor market conditions to determine the reasonableness of the prices wholesalers place on liquor and

In Kansas, wholesale liquor distributors are required to file bottle and case prices with the state. The alcohol control bureau then establishes a minimum "We will go to the Legislature if markup to be added on to the bottle price on file.

After little debate Thursday night, Student Senate unanimously approved a bill restructuring the student ac-

With the passing of this bill, the Union, Student Publications Inc. and Recreational Services will no longer be part of the student activity fee, but will have separate student fees.

Dave Adams, director of Student Publications, said the separation would allow the organization enough time to explain its budget to Senate during the allocation process.

Senate also approved a bill increasing the student fees for the Union and Student Publications.

The Union will receive an increase of $5 for full-time students and $2.50 for part-time students, bringing the totals to $17 and $8.50 respectively. Student Publications will receive an increase of $1.80 for full-time and $1.40 for part-time students, making the new fee totals $4.80 and $2.40 respectively.

If the organizations didn't receive the increase they would have to raise

The Union has not received an increase in fees for 10 years, and Student Publications has not had an increase for 17 years.

Senate also approved a resolution commending Gale Simons, professor of nuclear engineering, for designing a radiation dosimeter that detects the emission of low-energy beta particles more accurately than any other dosimeter.

Also commended was Sally Traeger, Senate chairwoman, and Steven Johnson, student body president, for their leadership.

In other action, the outgoing senators were presented with awards for their service as student senators, and the incoming senators were sworn in.

Brazil's debt problems threaten U.S. economy

Last week, Brazil announced it was suspending interest payments on its foreign debt, a situation which could likely prove disastrous for the United States.

Brazil's foreign debt is the second largest in the world, next to the United States,' which took over the lead for this dubious honor just last year. About $24 million of its total $108 million debt is owed to U.S. commercial banks, notably large New York banks. A loss of this kind is bound to create some financial difficulties.

Most of these loans were made in the 1970s when Brazil was ruled by a military regime. This has caused the new civilian leadership many problems. After taking over two years ago, President Jose Sarney has had a tough time trying to pull his country out of the mess caused by 20 years of military rule. Along with the huge debt, the country also has to deal with an annual inflation rate of more than 200 percent.

With its small economic base, Brazil has had a hard time trying to keep up payments on its debt. But the good news so far is Brazil is only suspending payment on interest. This will result in a loss of income for many banks, but it is not that serious of a blow to the assets of these lending institu-

Honesty is (usually) best policy

Have you ever wanted to tell someone what you really thought of them or what they were doing? Have you ever wanted the feedback from other people on how you were behaving or working?

prefer people to tell me what they are thinking rather than holding it inside. I would prefer people tell me what they think of me, of the job I'm doing or not doing, of how I act, even tell me how they think I write. And I would prefer they talk to me face to face, not through a third party or through a note. I'm a big girl, I can take it. Constructive criticism and honesty are things I need And I do mean constructive criticism not criticism designed to tear a person down. I am referring to praise as well. We need the honest feedback of a job well done.

But a lot of people can't take honesty. A lot of people cannot handle the idea they are less than perfect. That someone else on this earth knows the imperfections we try to hide from even ourselves. To tell the truth, it goes the other way, too. A lot of people don't know how to be direct, how to be honest, how to be tactful. There are several people I know whom I would like to talk to in a direct and honest manner. I can be tactful and honest, and I can say what I mean in a manner that would not be offensive. But would they consider the manner to be unoffensive? Probably not.

would need to get my point across. Why can't some people handle honesty? We prize the virtue of honesty, we're taught to be honest in all aspects of our lives, but we fail to be honest when someone might really need that honesty.

Because they can't handle the directness I

Part of why I don't say things I should is the sentiment I was taught when I was younger - if you don't have something good may lose my temper and say all the rotten things I've been holding in for eons, but I won't do it without provocation.

But I should.

I should be able to tell a student I think she is acting like a 3-year-old. I should be able to tell a fellow writer I think his style leaves something to be desired. I should be able to tell a broadcast student she just doesn't have the talent or the attitude it will take to become a success in this business. I should be able to tell an instructor what I think of her supposed teaching style or lack thereof. I should be able to tell people exactly what I

I have had several experiences when people have not told me something on the pretense of saving my feelings. And when they finally got around to telling me, or I found out from a third party, my feelings were hurt more than would have been the case in the first place.

If I can handle the honesty, I feel others should be able to also.

But I'm contradicting myself. I want honesty directed at me, but I can't direct honesty at others. I hate to hurt people. But am I doing them any favors by not being honest? Am I just perpetuating the problem and causing more hurt in the long run?

The people I don't like rarely realize I don't like them. There are exceptions, of course. I have become a bit more open about my emotions as I emerge from my shell of shyness. But for the most part I can tolerate anyone, even people I can't stand, for short periods of time. Am I being honest or hypocritical?

We require honesty and even look for it, but many people can't handle it. We respect someone who says exactly what he thinks or feels but we can't do it ourselves. We can't cause the pain. We're so afraid of upsetting someone, of making someone cry or making someone angry, of embarrassing ourselves. We're self-conscious about being honest.

I admit to being a hypocrite on this point. I keep to myself the items I probably should say. Yet I ask those around me to tell me what they undoubtedly think they should keep to themselves. I haven't decided whether this tendency is good or bad.

It comes down to circumstances, people, topics and the idea of courtesy.

What may be right for me may not be right for someone else. "One man's pleasure is another man's pain." The manner I use to talk to one person may be wrong for someone else to use or to hear. We have to gear each encounter to the situation. It's too bad we can't just say what we mean instead of using euphemisms or keeping our mouths shut.

It's a vicious circle. Do we sacrifice honesty to keep everyone happy? Or do we sacrifice other people's feelings to maintain honesty? Do we tell those we work with what we think of them? Or do we tolerate their petty attitudes for the time being in order to

The answers are up to the individual. If you think those around you can handle the honesty, say what you mean - both in criticism and praise. If you think the people you work with would go off the deep end and pout continuously, then keep your honesty to yourself at least the criticism. Continue with the praise.

As for me, I hope people are honest with me, but I will continue to keep a lot of what I think to myself. At least until those around me grow up enough to appreciate the honesty

A 'minor' irritation

Editor,

Recently, there have been several articles printed in the Collegian concerning the drinking situation in Aggieville and throughout Manhattan. Most have had to do with measures that taverns and clubs are taking to prevent "minors" from drinking. Every time I read one of these articles, I get mad for one basic reason: I am not a 'minor.'

I ceased being a "minor" the day I turned 18, which this weekend will have been two years ago. In those two years, I have been registered to defend my country and have registered to take part in my country's democracy. I have also assumed responsibility for legal contracts, become responsible for serving on juries and am now able to be tried as an adult for any crimes I may

If I am a "minor," why have I been given these adult responsibilities? Why am I legally required to pay on my housing contract with the Unviersity? Why, if I am a "minor," am I able to vote against the same legislators who decided I am not old enough to drink

The fact is the drinking age is wrong. There is nothing right or just about it. Until it is lowered to 18, it never will be. Another fact is now that most of the taverns in town are closing their doors to all us "minors," there is now precious little for us to do to socialize. One alternative that I have seen is for "minors" to illegally obtain alcohol, then drive out to Tuttle or somewhere else where they won't be bothered, get drunk and then drive back to where they live, endangering themselves and everyone else on the If I recall correctly, the reason the federal government is blackmailing the states into raising their drinking ages was to curb drunk driving. I think it's doing just the opposite.

If you are a student, I urge you to contact your legislator and tell him that you are not a minor and you would appreciate not being treated like one. I would also urge the staff of the Collegian to remind its readers every time they run a story concerning this matter in the future that citizens between the ages of 18 and 21 are not "minors.

Sad juxtaposition

I draw your attention to the Feb. 25 Collegian. Two advertisements in juxtaposition appeared in the bottom left-hand side of Page 5: One was an ad for Date Rape Awareness Week and the other was an ad for Juarez Tequila. The tequila ad showed a woman with her dress in disarray, her mouth open and a drink in front of her. The caption said, "Take me home." This ad conveys the same mistaken message that our culture so consistently promotes to young men - namely that women 'want it and will love it' whether they say that or not. This is not the case. Rape is a terrifying and dehumanizing experience.

It is also a criminal offense. In this country, we are constantly bombarded by images such as the tequila ad. Is it any wonder that the incidence of rape and date rape is such a monumental and tragic problem?

I have two hopes. One is that this sad juxtaposition was unintentional; and the other is that if we continue to call attention to this type of thing and learn from it, awareness will be raised, the snickers will die out and the enemy will be named. This is not a joke; we are talking about violence against women - your sister, your friend, your mother.

The new W-4 form has many employees scratching their heads. Four major changes in the W-4 form have made it more complex, said Dave Donnelly, assistant professor of accounting.

The area of change affecting students most is the personal exemption category. Donnelly said if students can be claimed by their parents as exemptions, they no longer may claim themselves as a personal exemption.

"Not only does the student lose the personal exemption," Donnelly said, "but the standard (tax) deduction may be reduced to $500."

Before the Internal Revenue Service changed the form, the standard deduction for a single student was $2,540, while married students had a 1, 1987. If a form is not filed by this deduction of $3,760. Donnelly said the change won't affect married students because most file jointly and won't be claimed as exemptions by their parents.

Any non-wage income accumulated from interest, dividends, capital gains, some scholarships and fellowships, plus any wages earned, must be included as income.

If these earnings add up to more than $500, then a W-4 form must be filed. Scholarships that are not used to pay tuition, fees, books and course supplies must be counted as earn-

"For many students, the reduction in the standard allowable deductions and the loss of the personal exemption will force them to file in 1987,'

Donnelly said. The W-4 form must be filed by Oct. date, an employer will withhold the minimum amount based on information from previous W-4 forms.

An employer may over-withhold or under-withhold if a person does not file a form, Donnelly said. If overwithholding occurs, the only way to receive the money is to file a tax

If under-withholding takes place, a person will have to pay the difference between the amount from previous W-4 forms and the current required amount when filing a tax return, he said, adding that the person may be subject to a penalty.

Donnelly said there are no shortcuts to this year's form. He said a person could first try to work at it without assistance. If there are problems, employees should consult their employer or seek professional

'If you have to hire someone to do your tax return, you will probably need to seek help in preparing your W-4 form," he said.

The three other major areas of change are confusing as well, Donnelly said. Rules regarding itemized deductions have been changed to exclude IRAs. In addition, the elderly and blind exemption of 1986 has been changed to a standard deduction.

The IRS has been heavily criticized for making the form so confusing. Congress asked the IRS to devise an easier way of determining withholding allowances, he said.

But Donnelly said he believes the IRS would probably revise the instruction sheet for the W-4 form, not print an entirely new form.

Pari-mutuel bill wins passage House

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - A bill that would implement the constitutional amendment voters approved in November to legalize pari-mutuel gambling on horse and dog races won final passage Thursday in the Kansas

The measure, which passed 98-24, advanced for the final vote after it consumed nearly three hours of floor debate Wednesday. Lawmakers considered a dozen amendments during debate and adopted six of the

Rep. Robert H. Miller, chairman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, said pari-mutuel races could begin as early as this summer at Eureka Downs in Greenwood County if the proposal clears the Senate later this session and is sign-

Miller, R-Wellington, said the racetrack at Eureka, where horse races have been conducted for about 100 years, probably would be the first track in the state to operate under the pari-mutuel legislation.

The state may receive between $3 million and $4 million per year in pari-mutuel taxes after the legislation is fully implemented, Miller said. However, he said it will be "several years down the road" before pari-mutuel provides that much money for the state coffers.

The rates the pari-mutuel taxes are assessed sparked controversy as the measure progressed through Miller's committee and during a floor debate that lasted nearly three hours on Wednesday.

A provision that establishes a special, lower tax rate for combination horse and dog racing facilities came through the debate intact. The House voted 74-48 against an amendment that would have removed tax breaks in the bill for dual horse-dog

The 53-page bill also establishes a five-member state racing commission, which would be appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate.

The complex proposal also establishes the rules under which nonprofit corporations will be licensed to conduct races, sets out who will receive portions of the pari-mutuel gambling money and establishes restrictions designed to guard against criminal activity

Another controversial section allows the racing commission to adopt rules to govern the use of socalled "live lures" that are used in the training of greyhounds.

That section was amended into the bill during the debate, striking language Rep. Ginger Barr, R-Auburn, attached to the measure in committee. It would have prohibited using live rabbits, other non-domestic animals and birds which are often killed during training.

Removal of the ban prompted Barr to vote against the measure Thurs-

'Allowing rabbits, whose nervous system is similar to a dog's, to be used as bait for the training of greyhounds is wrong," she said in explaining her vote. "It is barbaric," Barr added. "If the National Greyhound Association does not publicly support the concept, then why should the state."

In other action, the House accepted changes the Senate made in a bill that establishes a 13-member Kansas Coal Commission.

Lady Cats set to open phase two of season

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

Phase one of the Lady Cats' season is over. And it was definitely a success as K-State closed out its regularseason schedule with a 90-81 win over Missouri in Ahearn Field House to capture a share of the Big Eight Conference championship.

Now it's time for K-State, 9-5 in the Big Eight and 20-7 overall, to enter phase two of the 1986-87 campaign as the team prepares for the conference's postseason tournament Saturday through Monday in Salina's Bicentennial Center.

the Oklahoma Sooners Saturday in the first round. Game time is set for 6

Kansas received the top seed in the tournament due to a tie-breaking process, and Missouri dropped from first to third after Wednesday's loss to K-State.

One would expect the Lady Cats to be one of the tournament favorites, but Coach Matilda Mossman is not making any predictions - except that it is going to be tough for any team to win the tourney.

"Anybody you play is going to be tough," Mossman said. "It is just go-

K-State, seeded second, takes on ing to come down to whoever plays well for the three days of the tournament

"I expect the parity of the regular season to continue in the tournament. Three out of the four firstround games match teams who have split their two regular-season games.'

And K-State's first-round game is one of those three as the Lady Cats and OU split their earlier two contests, with both teams winning at home. Oklahoma defeated K-State, 70-47, in Norman, and the Lady Cats downed the Sooners, 80-69, in Ahearn Oklahoma's season is a perfect example of the parity that Mossman was talking about. The Sooners waltzed through their nonconference schedule, compiling a 12-1 record.

But then something happened. The Sooners, who entered Big Eight play ranked in the Top 20, struggled against conference foes and finished 18-9 overall and 6-8 in the league.

Mossman said not to count out the Sooners' explosive offensive attack.

"They have several very quick girls, and we can't allow them to get into their running game," Mossman said. "We definitely have to make them play a half-court game."

Mossman, who was recently named the Big Eight's Coach of the Year, said she is happy with her team's play lately - especially after the Missouri game. Against the Lady Tigers, K-State had undoubtedly its best game of the season to date, shooting more than 65 percent from the field.

'I think we can take Wednesday night's game and build on it," Mossman said.

K-State, with four players scoring in double figures, is led by senior center Sue Leiding with a 16-pointper-game average. Susan Green, after scoring a career-high 29 points against Missouri, is averaging 12.7 points, while Carlisa Thomas and Tracey Bleczinski are each throwing in 11.6 and 10.3 points per game, respectively.

In the other first-round games, No. 1 Kansas (16-12) takes on No. 8 Iowa State (11-16) at 2 p.m. No. 4 Nebraska (15-12) goes against No. 5 seed Oklahoma State (16-11) at noon. No. 3 seed Missouri (19-8) faces No. 6 Colorado (14-13) at 8 p.m.

Semifinal games are scheduled for Sunday afternoon beginning at 2 p.m., with the championship game scheduled for Monday night at 7 p.m.

Seniors wish final year would never conclude

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

Four members of the K-State women's basketball team are quickly approaching the end to their final collegiate season, a season they say is special - one they wish could continue.

"What (assistant coach Eddie) Vaughn suggested we do is go get in an experiment next season before practice and see if they can reverse the aging process so we can get some more eligibility," said senior guard Susan Green.

For the senior Lady Cats, forward/center Carlisa Thomas, center Sue Leiding, guard Theza Fitzpatrick and Green, the thrill of playing basketball at K-State is something that will never leave them. "I think I'm going to always end up out on a court playing sometimes," Thomas said.

"I love the game. I love it to death." But they all realize that it will never be quite the same experience out on the court

"It just won't be the same (playing after the season is over)," Leiding said. "We just won't be playing the 'game'

The four seniors agreed this season is the one they will remember the most because this has been the best basketball of their

"The thing that I've liked the most is this past year," Leiding said. "The whole time I was at home this summer I kept thinking this is my last time around. That's why I've played the way I have this year. Because I have the attitude if I don't do it this year I'll never do it.

"The one thing I wanted to do is (finish good)," she added. "Go out with it good, not go out with it bad. And I think this year has been good."

"Good" wouldn't suit Leiding's performance this year. She leads the team on offense with 16 points per game and has scored in double figures in all but three games

In Wednesday's game against Missouri she passed the 1,000-point career scoring mark - scoring 24 points and raising her career total to 1,021 points.

Leiding wasn't the only Lady Cat to score more than 20 points Wednesday night against Missouri in Ahearn Field House the final home game for the seniors.

Green nailed 29 points, 17 in the first half, to set a career and Lady Cat season-high mark. She is K-State's second-leading scorer with 12.7 points per game.

With three assists against Oklahoma State earlier in the season, Green took over the fourth spot on the Lady Cats' career assists chart. She has 266 assists in her four years at K-State and is second in assists among conference players in Big Eight play with 2.0 assists per game.

Pretty amazing stats for a girl many said would never make it as a player at K-State. "Coming here to play at Kansas State was a dream come true when I was a freshman," Green said. "They were a nationally ranked team and a lot of people told me I couldn't do it as a 5-8 guard from Kansas. I don't regret anything. I've learned so much about people and things that I think will help parallel

The only member of the starting five not to average in double figures on offense is Fitzpatrick, fifth on the team's scoring ledger with 7.4 points per game. This fact doesn't bother Fitzpatrick. Her specialty is

"My defense is the best part of my game," Fitzpatrick said. "I like jumping around (on defense). If I'm not moving I don't feel comfortable.

With 54 steals for the season, Fitzpatrick ranks second on the team and leads K-State's guards in rebounding with 3.9 boards per outing. Fitzpatrick transferred from Forest Park Community College in St. Louis, Mo., after her sophomore year.

Last, but definitely not least, is Thomas who was recently named to the first team on the All-Big Eight Conference squad.

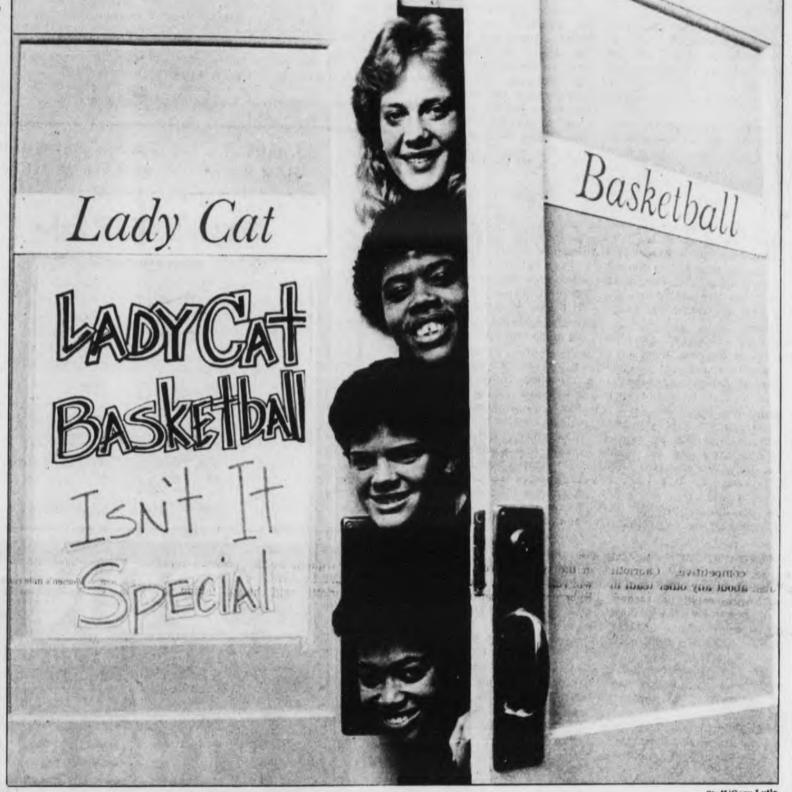

Rebounding and breaking records are Thomas' trademark. With 10.3 boards per game, she leads the team in rebounds, and is the Lady Cats' career leader with 880 caroms. She ranks 11th on the Big Eight career rebounding honor roll.

Needing only five assists, Thomas stands a good chance of becoming the Lady Cats' career assist leader. She has 1,069 points and ranks 15th in the Big Eight scoring list for the season. Records and statistics don't reveal the most integral part of the senior Lady Cats their drive, determination, confidence in themselves and their teammates. They're first in line to compliment performances of K-State's six freshmen reserves.

"They take a lot of pressure off of you, knowing there's someone else who can come in there and get the job done," Green

"That's what we needed this year." Thomas said. "Our last two years we didn't really have a strong bench. And the freshmen who came in this year, they came in ready to play. You can look up to that."

Even with all the previous accolades, the four seniors said they still have two goals to accomplish as a team - their second Big Eight postseason tournament title and an NCAA championship.

"I think the ultimate goal of mine is a NCAA title," Green said. "And we haven't reached that, but there's still a possibility."

"You always set high goals," she added. "When you do that ... set them at the stars...you might get to the clouds. You can't get anywhere if you don't set them real high." The freshmen players have mutual respect for their senior teammates. "They always help me," said freshman guard Elyse Funk. "They talk to me...It's a lot of fun because we work together.'

Three-point shot crucial for Purdue

By The Associated Press

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind. -Purdue's Troy Lewis scored 18 points Thursday night, including a 3-point field goal that halted a strong Indiana comeback in the second half, to lead the sixth-ranked Boilermakers to a 75-64 Big Ten Conference basketball victory over the No. 3 Hoosiers.

Purdue, which won its sixth consecutive game, climbed within one-half game of the first-place Hoosiers with three games remaining in the conference race.

The Boilermakers are 22-3 overall and the Hoosiers 23-3.

Purdue took control with an 18-6 first-half spurt and built the margin to nine at halftime. Purdue's Todd Mitchell had 17 points, including five free throws in the final minutes, while Everette Stephens, added 14 points. Daryl Thomas led Indiana with 18 points, while Rick Calloway and Steve Alford finished with 15 each.

In other action, Kenny Smith scored 22 points to lead secondranked North Carolina to a 77-71 Atlantic Coast Conference basketball victory over No. 17 Duke Thursday night at Chapel Hill, N.C.

Pressure off as baseball team prepares for season

By JEFF RAPP

Sports Writer

In more ways than one, the pressure of high expectations has been lifted from K-State's baseball team this season.

Last spring, predictions to finish first in the Big Eight Conference and presssure to be nationally ranked weighed heavily on players' shoulders. Those notions, however, were at least partially induced by former head coach Gary Vaught.

Vaught has since departed, and first-year head coach Mike Clark is approaching this year's campaign a little bit differently.

"Last year these guys were told they were going to win the conference. We're taking more of a 'wait and see' approach, and 'let's not say how good we're going to be," Clark

"Let's just go out on the field and try to do something positive every day and get a little bit better every time," he added.

The Wildcats also have pressure lifted from them just by last spring's 5-19 conference record. Although last season K-State was considered a favorite, Clark said this year's team will approach every game with a fresh outlook.

"These are the greatest bunch of kids I've ever worked with. Last year they were under so much pressure they went into deep valleys. This year the valleys won't be so deep. We'll learn game by game and hopefully, by the end of the season, be an awfully good team," Clark

Last spring's dismal season is an inspiration for this year's squad,

"The kids want to prove last year was a fluke. This year, positive things will happen.'

K-State will compete against nationally ranked Oklahoma State (No. 6) and Oklahoma (No. 19) within the Big-Eight conference. The 'Cats will try to knock off those two, plus the rest of the conference, by piecing together a partially makeshift

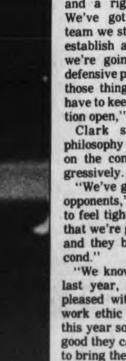

"Our depth in certain places drops off drastically. We've had to convert two position players into pitchers to get nine pitchers on our roster," Clark said.

Some converted pitchers include senior infielder Mike Hamacher, who hasn't pitched since he was a senior in high school, and freshman walk-on Ray Baughn, who was a catcher for an American Legion team

"Baughn has some good pitches, but you don't know what he's going to do (in a game situation)," Clark said. "He pitched maybe five games in the American Legion.'

Clark doesn't have the luxury of an deep bench, so he said each player must fill his role for the team to be successful.

"To be successful this year we need total commitment from the kids. They need to accept their role

He also said a number of situations, ranging from good hitters who are lesser fielders and great fielders who can't produce offense, have led him to adopt a unique strategy this

"Some teams have a left-handed and a right-handed hitting team. We've got basically an offensive team we start out with and once we establish a lead late in the game, we're going to come in with our defensive people. To know when to do those things is why we're going to have to keep the lines of communication open," Clark said.

Wrist-wrestlers vie for championships

By BILL LANG Collegian Reporter

It was a scene reminiscent of Sly Stallone's current movie "Over the Top" Thursday night at the intramural wrist-wrestling championships at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Stacey Davis, lightweight champion of the residence hall division, clasped hands with Bill Garst, lightweight champion of the independent division, while an estimated 100 people watched and yelled.

Each was looking at the floor, waiting...waiting to pull and strain, hoping to pin each other's arm for the win.

A minute and a half later, Davis pulled the arm of Garst, freshman in general arts and sciences, down for the win. Davis, freshman in engineering, was awarded the alluniversity title in the lightweight division.

Davis, a Goodnow Hall resident, said if it had not been for some good tutoring he wouldn't have done as "I got into wrist wrestling by way of Dave Young (senior in physical education)," Davis said.

"He was heavyweight champion last year and he showed me how to do it properly, how to get the leverage," he added. "That's the whole key to the match - leverage."

Rockey Dvorak, an offensive tackle on the football team and senior in restaurant management, got into the championships for a different reason. "I got voted into doing it at chapter meeting (of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity) Wednesday night,"

Teams set for Big Eight meet

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

K-State's track teams will wind up the regular-season indoor track campaign today and Saturday at the Big Eight Indoor Championships hosted by the University of Nebraska in Lin-

Coach John Capriotti said the host Cornhuskers are almost "a shoe-in" for first place in the men's division.

"I don't see anybody beating Nebraska's men," Capriotti said. "They're the overwhelming favorites."

As for the conference runner-up, Capriotti said it will be a battle between four squads.

'Second place in the meet is going to be real competitive," Capriotti said. "Just about any other team in the conference could be second. There are four teams that I think have a real good shot at it, and they are Oklahoma, Iowa State, Kansas and Kansas State."

Nebraska is also favored in the women's division, but Capriotti said K-State and Missouri will scrap for second.

Capriotti said the Wildcat men should make a big improvement over last year's seventh-place performance in the meet.

"I think the men are looking to finish in the top four somewhere and the women in the top three," Capriotti said. "If we come back with those two accomplishments I'll be happy."

Track squads to end season

K-State's Kenny Harrison, who has the longest collegiate triple jump this year at 55-feet-3-inches, is favored to win the triple jump and long jump. He will also run a leg in the mile

In the sprint races, Sean Banks, John Williams and Aaron Roberson will be strong contributors in points, Capriotti said. Banks and Williams own the best times this season in the 400- and 300-yard dashes, respective-

In the distance races, the 'Cats are led by Ron Stahl, conference leader in the two-mile run. Brian Zwalen will run the mile, and Jim Knutson, Roberson, Jon Johnson and Stahl will team up for the distance medley relay.

Brad Speer, the Big Eight's outdoor champion in the high jump, highlights K-State's hopes in the field events. Speer is currently tied for the highest leap in the conference this season. In the throws, Dan O'Mara and Dan Meyers are probable to place in the shot put.

"We're pretty balanced across the board," Capriotti said. "We have field eventers, we have middledistance runners and we have sprinters...that are all pretty strong in their events."

On the women's team, Pinkie

Suggs leads the conference in the shot put and is favored in that event. Joy Jones is favored to win the 60-yard dash, and Chris Vanatta should nab the gold in the two-mile Women expected to place in the meet are Kim Kilpatrick in the hurdles, and sprinters Anita Ison and Karen Brown. Middle-distance runners Anne Stadler, Betsy Silzer, Angie Barry and Dimita Jones are expected to place high in their respective events. Felicia Carpenter, a returning All-American in the triple jump, is expected to fare well in that event.

Capriotti said he is taking a realistic approach as to how his teams will fare in the meet, but remains optimistic as to the outcome.

"It's close in there," he said. "Only a few points will probably separate the second-through fourthplace teams on both levels, especially the men's. Last year, five points separated third through eighth."

The two-day event, held at the Bob Devaney Sports Center in Lincoln, begins today at 9 a.m.

K-State needs leadership in season finale against Oklahoma

Senior trio key for OU

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

He wears No. 32 and his teammates call him "T-Mac." Opponents know him as Tim McCalister, and he's one of the most dominating players to ever wear an Oklahoma basketball uniform.

McCalister, a 6-foot-3 senior guard for the Sooners, is a Mr. Do-It-All man. He has been a catalyst and leader in his 31/2 years at OU. With the help of fellow seniors Darryl Kennedy and David Johnson, he has led the Sooners to three straight NCAA postseason tournament appearances. The trio has won 106 games in their careers thus far. They have also been instrumental in 63 wins of the 64 games they've played at Lloyd Noble Arena in Norman - the site of K-State's regular-season finale Friday. "That McCalister-Kennedy-Johnson bunch won 85 games from their freshman to junior years and only Georgetown (with 93) did better in the same time span," said Sooners coach Billy Tubbs. "That makes them a very special group.

Very special indeed. Few players have such great careers. Few players rewrite record books, which is what McCalister has spent much of his career doing. McCalister, who has never been a first-team, All-Big Eight Conference selection, started this season in 20th position on the all-time Big Eight career scoring chart. He had 1,579 points.

Since Oklahoma's opening game this season against Brigham Young in November, McCalister has increased his point total to 2,140 points, making him the highest-scoring guard ever to play in the conference. McCalister bypassed former Wildcat guard Mike Evans for fourth place on the Big Eight scoring chart Saturday against Nebraska, and needs just 27 points to move into third ahead of Nebraska's Dave Hoppen (1983-86). Fifty more points, and he will top Iowa State's Barry Stevens (1982-85) for second.

But in all probability, McCalister will not overtake the top spot held by an old Sooner teammate, Wayman Tisdale. Tisdale scored 2,661 points in his three-year career at OU. From his statistics, one would be led to think McCalister is a pure scorer. He's not. "I have to be the floor leader and kind of settle the guys down," Mc-Calister said, describing his role.

He ranks fifth in scoring in the Big Eight this year, averaging 20.1 points in conference games. It's the other things he does on the court that make him extra-special.

A Big Eight news bureau release said McCalister should become the first player in Big Eight history to record 2,000 points, 500 rebounds, 600 assists and 300 steals.

He has already surpassed the steal mark with 305, and before Tuesday's game with Iowa State, needed 30 to set a new conference record.

Oklahoma has other great players in addition to McCalister, hence their 9-4 conference and 21-6 overall records. For example, Darryl Kennedy has moved right behind Mc-Calister on the all-time Big Eight career scoring chart with 2,116

With so many great players on one team, selfishness or jealousy is not an uncommon occurrence. Not so with the Sooners.

"I don't think there's any animosity," McCalister said. "If one guy on our team doesn't do well, I think we have the kind of team where the next two guys on the team can step up and

K-State will try to stop Oklahoma's Tim McCalister, who scored 34 points in the teams' first match-up, in their game tonight in Norman, Okla.

fill in. If I don't have a good game, Kennedy or Johnson can step right in and just pick up where we left off. I think it's a good thing for the whole

When K-State played Oklahoma Jan. 24, McCalister played all 40 minutes of the game (he averages 36.8 minutes playing time) and scored 34 points.

By JEFF RAPP Sports Writer

You have to believe. That's what K-State's basketball coaches are telling the Wildcats going into today's regular-season finale against Oklahoma in Norman.

'The kids have to believe what we do in preparation can defeat Oklahoma tonight. We've got to sell them on the things that we can do," said assistant coach Greg Grensing. K-State is 17-9 overall and fourth in the Big Eight Conference at 7-6. Oklahoma stands at 21-6 and is tied with Kansas for second in the Big Eight at 9-4, following a loss Tuesday to Iowa State in Ames. Convincing the players may be difficult after a tough loss in double overtime to Kansas and blowing a 13-point lead in the defeat by Missouri. In the latter stages of the game against the Tigers, Grensing said the Wildcats placed themselves in a somewhat stifling situation.

"We've now come to grips with the fact that against Missouri we just looked around at each other during those last five minutes and knotted up. We weren't sure if we could do it. "But once you've faced the reality of that and learned how to deal with it, you can address the problem, and I think we'll do that," Grensing said. He said the problem with losing games like the one against Missouri is a lack of leadership among the team. But he said leadership may be developing, even at this late date. "The lack of leadership due to having never been through this before (has been a problem). If you look at the most experience we've got, even Norris (Coleman) hasn't been through a race. With each experience we're going to learn something and grow from it. We're taking one game at a time."

Grensing said not only will there have to be a positive attitude, but a number of other factors must be present to beat the Sooners.

sales job by Coach (Lon) Kruger to make them believe they can (win). Also, things have to fall in place. There has to be luck involved with the skill, we have to have the breaks go our way, we have to keep people out of foul trouble and we have to attack them," he said.

Most of Oklahoma's starting lineup looks like a "Who's Who in Big Eight Basketball." Senior guard Tim Mc-Calister leads OU in offense, averaging more than 20 points per contest. Darryl "Choo" Kennedy, a 6-foot-5 senior forward who scored 32 points and grabbed 15 rebounds against the 'Cats in their last meeting, chips in 16.8 points per game.

Harvey Grant and Ricky Grace, who will make many writers' Big Eight newcomer teams, have fit right in to OU's lineup after transferring from junior colleges. Grant, from Independence Community College, leads OU in rebounding with 9.8 per game and averages 15.7 points per outing. Grace averages 11.5 points per game. The other OU starter is 6-6 junior forward Dave Sieger. He averages 7.8 points and 3.1 rebounds per game. Notes: Oklahoma defeated K-State, 81-78, Jan. 24 in a sold out Ahearn Field House...OU leads the series, 82-75, and has won the last 11 meetings...The Sooners have won 63 of their last 64 games played in Lloyd Noble Arena. OU is ranked 12th in the Associated Press poll and 14th according to United Press International.

K-Staters share knowledge

High school students study human cadavers

By TOM DENZEL Collegian Reporter

K-State is one of the few universities that use human cadavers in its undergraduate courses and offers the chance for Kansas high school students to watch a demonstration on a human cadaver.

"Not many universities use cadavers in their undergraduate teaching courses, and as one which does, we are happy to share our resources with Kansas high school students," said Terry C. Johnson, director of the Division of Biology."

The Division of Biology offers Kansas high school students the opportunity to attend a lecturedemonstration given by Lynn Schanker, instructor in biology.

Demonstrations begin with a brief explanation on the care and respect for the cadavers, and stress that cadavers are corpses of human beings who have willed their bodies to research and teaching, said Ann Stalheim-Smith, assistant biology professor and supervisor of the demonstrations.

These bodies are not unclaimed bodies. The families have already held memorial services for them. and the bodies have been embalmed at the University of Kansas Medical Center, she said.

"Kansans seem to be more caring about each other and their youth, so they will their bodies to research and view it as a contribution to someone else's education," Stalheim-Smith

"A lot of people take for granted the simplest funtions such as walking and talking, and then you take this course and you really learn to appreciate the humam body," said cadaver team member Desiree Doell, sophomore in speech pathology and audiology.

Each demonstration includes an examination of several systems, such as digestive, circulatory, urinary and skeletal muscle

The cadaver dissecting team prepares the cadavers for the demonstration. This team is an accelerated group of students from Structure and Function of the Human Body class who devote many hours outside of their regular coursework, Stalhem-Smith said.

The demonstrations require 50 minuntes to two hours, depending on how much time the school requests, Stalheim-Smith said.

The petition for human cadaver demonstrations was first requested in 1974 by a biology student of Allabelle Stonehocker, biology teacher at Manhattan High School.

As an outgrowth of Stonehocker's request, the biology division has expanded its offerings to high schools outside of Manhattan.

The success of this program and its growth is reinforced by the 19 high schools that registered for the demonstrations in the 1986 fall semster. More than 500 high school students attended the demonstrations last semester.

Growth of the cadaver demonstration program has snowballed partially due to the "successful graduate" concept, Johnson said.

Early participants from Stonehocker's class began teaching after graduating from college and requested a demonstration for their students.

because they are both scarce and expensive, but we here at K-State are very fortunate to have these cadavers because there is no better way to learn the human anatomy than to be able to work on a cadaver," Stalheim-Smith said.

"Most persons' first reaction to something like this is 'that's gross' or 'that's sick,' but this is for the benefit of everyone," Doell said. "If we did not have people that willed their bodies to research and education we would never learn anything about the human body."

"Blame me for this if you want to. -I'll take responsibility. But because of the whole state of the economy, we have to come up with more funds."

Last Friday, the student representatives discussed with Miller and Moore the possibility of using a fullcosting method.

A full-costing plan would itemize all the services provided by each of the agencies to the University while considering all services that the University provides to each agency.

However, Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics and student body president, said he felt this method would be too expensive.

"We've decided against the (full) cost-accounting audit," Johnson said. "It would be very expensive, and we don't know who would pay for

Ballerina Girls

ink slippered feet skip, meander and tiptoe into the studio. Giggles ring out as a whisper hisses through cupped hands

A twirl here, a leap there and it's time for barre exercises to begin in Tricia Durbin's kindergarten ballet class at the Sharron Washington Dance Studio, 323 Poyntz Ave.

"Let's stand in first position," Durbin, sophomore in dance, calls out to the girls as Tchaikovsky from a tape player in the corner fills the room. "OK, now demi, straight, hold and one more...now a grande plie slooooow...all the way down...don't lean forward!" Limbs quiver as the miniature ballerinas strain to follow Durbin's lead. Left arms extend at various angles from squirming bodies as right hands grasp the barre that lends much needed support. Sharron Washington, director of her school for the past 16 years, walks back and forth supervising the young dancers in Durbin's class, straightening a leg here, placing a foot in proper second position there. "That's right! Good! That's the idea!" Washington smiles. Durbin also teaches first-through fifthgraders at the school, where she too was a student, beginning at age 4. She has taught with the school four years.

Black, bright red, white and purple leotards give the class a look of live jelly beans. Energy-filled girls step out of line for a moment, jumping back the next.

"By age 4 they can take a pretty good Washington says. "That's probably the youngest they start."

Durbin adds, "We try to give them imagery to learn from, just simple things with some creative ideas." Age 4 is a good time to begin teaching correct form, although care is necessary so as not to push the developing bodies too much.

Durbin gives instructions for a routine to Joanna Bellizzi during fance class.

"We stress good posture, graceful walking...so they're a little more ladylike," Durbin says.

'Straight, front and straight," Durbin moves through the barre exercises. Twelve pairs of eyes check their dancing form as they stare across the room at the wall mirror.

Student Kayla Ellis, 6, says the barre is the most difficult. "It's hard because when you point your toes you can't always get your feet to do what you want them

Durbin continues, "Point your toes! Don't bend your knee."

Washington switches music to a Broadway tune they are choreographing for a May recital.

In unison, the girls glide foward with slow, graceful steps. Reaching the other side of the room, three step out of order and hug each other, laughing. A quick look from Durbin and the three move back into line - playtime comes later.

"Usually you have to keep the material moving quickly for the little ones. With the older ones you can work on form," says Washington, who teaches students from pre-school through high school. The school is in its best year yet with some 200 students in 27 classes meeting once a

"I really love it," Durbin says. "Especially the little ones." They will come in and say "Hi, teacher" and demonstrate the dance moves they have been practicing. "It's so worth it," Durbin

The little girls prefer to do quick moves, when they can move around and keep their creative energy flowing. The older ones direct their motions with more grace and patience, she notes.

"Some days they're really wound up. Their attention span is about two minutes. So I try to do things really different to keep their attention," Durbin says.

Moving on to the recital steps, Durbin faces the mirror, glancing over her shoulder every so often.

A brown-haired dancer decides to improvise her own set of twirls along the way, then returns to synchronization with the others.

"Get your arms out," a girl signals to her neighbor. "Ouch! That was my toe!"

"Listen to the music," Durbin says as the girls begin to sing along while skipping around in circles.

"Some days they'll come in and give me a big hug," Durbin says, adding it boosts her morale after a long rehearsal of squirming ballerinas.

The students have been consistent in returning to the school year after year, Washington says. Efforts to keep costs reasonable have left toe shoes as the major expense, she says.

"They don't start with toe shoes until about 12 years usually. Their feet aren't formed well enough before then."

Working with young ballerinas, Durbin, who hopes to join a dance company someday, teaches that a good dancer is "someone who never stops learning and who knows that you can never be good enough."

She stresses that dancers must never be overconfident or they may lose their edge. "Did we get out of order again?" Dur-

Durbin switches the music to a lively classical piece and allows the girls to dance on their own for a few minutes.

The studio becomes a blur of dainty swirls, graceful plies amid a few bumps and teetering on tip toes. "It's a good way for them to get their energy out," Durbin laughs. Class ends with a quiet period of soft

Sports movie zones in on town's spirit

By GARY JOHNSON Collegian Reviewer

When so many Hollywood moviemakers seem content simply bombarding their audiences with flashy visuals and trendy music, it's refreshing to find a film like "Hoosiers" that takes a simple ap-

The success of the movie depends almost entirely upon whether or not we become interested in the plight of a balding, middle-age basketball coach. That's not exactly a formula for success, but surprisingly enough "Hoosiers" might become the sleeper hit of the year. In the spirit of "Breaking Away" and the original "Rocky" (not the increasingly simplistic sequels), "Hoosiers" is the story of an underdog who struggles to succeed against tremendous odds. Gene Hackman plays this underdog/basketball coach. He's not one of our most exciting actors, but what he lacks in charisma he makes up for in an uncanny, chameleon-like ability to fit into roles of ordinary, working-class Americans. His pale, freekled face can hardly be called handsome but his eyes show a strength of character that few actors can

This strength is precisely what "Hoosiers" is about. The story takes place in small-town America Hickory, Ind., 1951). It's a town that lives for basketball, a town where the local movie theater closes on game nights. When a new coach steps in, one with a shady past, and starts shaking up the system, changing the practice schedule, practicing fundamentals instead of scrimmaging, kicking players off the team who don' listen to what he says and losing the first few games, the townspeo ple call a meeting for the purpose of ousting him.

But this coach (an ex-college coach who spent the last 10 years in the Army) refuses to compromis his own integrity to satisfy the townspeople's whims. Eventually the locals begin to realize the have a coach with the determina tion to turn the undisciplined team See 'HOOSIERS,' Page ' into a real winner.

The best scenes in "Hoosiers" come in the first hour, when the coach is still trying to hold onto his job. Later on the movie becomes pure Hollywood formula, and as a result the movie becomes quite predictable. The basketball scenes in particular are all too familiar. But because the film does such a fine job bringing its characters to life - characters that include a drunkard (Dennis Hopper) who Hackman enlists to help coach the team (on the condition he stop drinking), and a teacher (Barbara Hershey) who gradually learns to respect Hackman because of his determination — the predictability doesn't become a big liability.

Also in the movie's favor is director David Anspaugh's painstaking attention to detail. He has created a genuinely convincing small-town atmosphere, complete with leaf-strewn streets and bandbox-sized gymnasiums - precisely the kind of environment in which this exhilarating story must take

Weather extends challenge of state ROTC tests

Steady rains, PSU cadets dominate day

By RICHARD BROADFOOT Collegian Reporter

If it ain't rainin', it ain't trainin'. The Army adage proved a little bit too true at the Kansas ROTC Ranger Challenge Saturday morning at Fort Riley.

In a steady downpour, teams from K-State, University of Kansas, Pittsburg State University, The Wichita State University and Emporia State University competed in a series of tests of military skill.

The cadets from Pittsburg State emerged victorious in the rainshortened competition and will represent the state in the regional competition March 28 at Fort Riley. Competitors will include teams from schools in Oklahoma and Texas.

Everybody felt pretty let down because they scored only the two events.'

- Doug Booker

the teams have shown here," said Captain Dana Bres, assistant professor of military science and ROTC enrollment officer. "It's kind of hard to want to be out in this weather."

The events included a hand grenade assault course, weapons assembly and marksmanship. Each phase was scored by accuracy or time, depending on the event.

Two of the more difficult timed events were a 10-kilometer march and a one-rope bridge event in which team members had to erect and cross a bridge. During the march, cadets ran in formation while wearing full field packs weighing about 30 pounds.

"We didn't do too well in the road march," said Carlos Stevenson, junior in finance. "We did better in the grenade throw, but it really wasn't affected by the weather."

In the hand grenade competition, cadets threw dummy grenades from behind a barrier toward a target 20 meters away.

Because the weather made several of the events infeasible, on-

Kevin Hutcheson, junior in computer science, and Carlos Stevenson, junior in business, run in the 10- kilometer road march as part of the Army ROTC ly scores from the road march and the hand grenade throw were compiled into the final score. Scores from the rope bridge and knot-tying events were disallowed because the ropes used in the events became waterlogged and unusable for com-

"I think if we just could have completed the bridge, we may have won," Stevenson said.

"Everybody felt pretty let down because they scored only the two events," said Captain Doug Booker, assistant professor of military science and team coach. "It was just a little anti-climatic after all the preparation that went into it."

Last semester, the team practiced throwing hand grenades and building rope bridges at Tuttle Creek Reservoir. In addition to practicing marksmanship at the firing range in the Military Science Building, team members ran on their own.

Despite adverse conditions, K-State cadets competed in the marksmanship event, though the event was not counted in the final

"The marksmanship event was especially difficult because of the rainy conditions," said Steve Hood, senior in education and team member. "You had to drain water from your sights between firing every round."

This year's Ranger Challenge is the first of what the Army ROTC hopes will become an annual event. But changes may be in store for next year.

Candidates for provost set at four

By BECKY HOWARD Staff Writer

A University search committee has narrowed the field of candidates for provost to four.

Dennis G. Brown of Montana State University, Myron S. Henry of Central Michigan University and J.L. Ozbun of Washington State University were selected from more than 80 individuals who applied for the position. The fourth candidate preferred not to be identified until an interview appointment has been set up, said Cornelia Flora, committee chairwoman and professor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

Throughout March, the candidates will be on campus going through a process in which they will be interviewed by University President Jon Wefald, the selection committee, the deans of the colleges and others, Flora said.

"Anyone who answers to the provost will speak to the candidates," she said.

The candidates were first narrowed from the original number of applicants to 30, then eight and, finally,

"We looked for firm evidence of administrative ability," Flora said.

"We also looked at what they have done, because for a provost to be legitimate to faculty, the person has to have been a good teacher and researcher," she said. "K-State is unique because it is a land-grant university, and we need someone who can work with extension, research and education, which are all vitally important to a land-grant university.

Owen Koeppe, University provost for the past seven years, will step down from his post June 30 to teach biochemistry.

The committee expects Wefald to name Koeppe's replacement in early April after it makes its recommendations following the interviews.

"We had some very good candidates. I wish we could have had more minorities, women and people in the humanities, but I think our final four selections understand best the needs of the position," Flora

Gates abandons nomination for CIA post, newspaper says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Former Sen. Paul Laxalt said Sunday he doubts President Reagan is ready to renounce the U.S. arms-sale initiative with Iran, despite the Tower commission's condemnation of that policy and Reagan's subsequent replacement of White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan.

Laxalt of Nevada, one of Reagan's closest longtime political confidants, said that in his address to the nation later this week, Reagan should admit "this was a flawed policy...a trip that shouldn't have been taken...I'd like to have him do that, but I don't think he's there in his own mind yet."

Reagan acknowledged in his Jan. 27 State of the Union address that "serious mistakes were made." but he has never conceded that the administration was seeking to trade arms for hostages.

Senate Republican leader Bob Dole of Kansas joined Laxalt in publicly urging Reagan to take full responsibility for the Iran-Contra affair when the president makes his nationally broadcast speech, probably on Wednesday

Sharing Laxalt's view, Dole said that

Reagan must "if not apologize, get very close to it" during his speech. Dole added, "I don't know if he'll do it or not."

Meanwhile, former Republican Sen. John Tower of Texas, appearing with Laxalt on ABC-TV's "This Week With David Brinkley," said he believes Reagan, in approving the sale of U.S. arms to Tehran. "had convinced himself that selling arms to Iran was strikingly different from ransoming hostages."

Former Sen. Edmund Muskie, D-Maine, a member of the Tower commission, said in a separate interview that the panel's members were appalled at Reagan's inability to recall details of "significant occasions" in the Iran arms sale affair.

"I wouldn't say we considered him a mental patient. But certainly we were all appalled by the absence of the kind of alertness and vigilance to his job and those policies that one expects of a president," Muskie said on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" program.

Reagan was "definite in what he remembered and what he didn't. But what he didn't remember astonished us, because by that time we had been exposed to a great deal of the story," Muskie said.

Laxalt, asked how Reagan reacted to the Tower commission report, said, "I think he was stunned" by the panel's findings. When he spoke to the president after the report's release, Laxalt added, "He didn't attempt to draw any distance (from it)...He embraced the report, and I think that's terribly impor-

Europeans welcome Soviet arms offer

By The Associated Press

LONDON - Western Europeans on Sunday welcomed the surprise Soviet offer of a separate deal to eliminate medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe, saying it was the long-awaited breakthrough to an agreement.

Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher of West Germany said it removed "the main obstacle" to an accord. NATO Secretary-General Lord Carrington called the offer "a substantial step forward."

The Danish Foreign Ministry said it was "a good and positive signal" and Belgian Foreign Minister Leo Tindemans said his reaction was to "rejoice."

The governments of Britain, France, the Netherlands and Italy were among those which refrained from any quick assessment, saying they wanted time to study the Soviet

U.S. Gen. Bernard Rogers, the departing commander-in-chief of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, warned against abolishing mediumrange nuclear missiles in Europe without making progress on other East-West disarmament issues - a warning echoed elsewhere. In a major policy switch, Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev announced Saturday that the Soviets were dropping their insistence that an agreement on medium-range missiles be linked to a deal limiting testing of the U.S. Strategic Defense Initiative, known as "Star Wars."

Soviet and U.S. arms control negotiators in Geneva scheduled a special session Monday to discuss Gorbachev's appeal that an accord on medium-range missiles be reached "without delay."

Sens. Claiborne Pell, D-R.I., and Richard Lugar, R-Ind., and U.S. Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard N. Perle, all in Geneva to observe the arms talks, welcomed

BEIRUT, Lebanon - A deposed second-in-command of Justice Minister Nabih Berri said Sunday he seized control of Berri's mainstream Shiite Moslem Amal militia in southern Lebanon.

Berri's office dismissed the claim as a "small problem that was quickly ironed out" in the coastal town of Zahrani, 30 miles south of Beirut.

Reporters said the mutinous militia had control of Lebanon's southern coastal highway but their strength elsewhere was not strong. They said the rebels appeared to have passive support of the Palestine Liberation Organization and a pro-Iranian faction opposed to Syria's intervention in Moslem west Beirut. Soviets await U.S. arms response

MOSCOW - State-run Soviet news media Sunday hailed Mikhail S. Gorbachev's offer to rid Europe of superpower medium-range nuclear missiles as a "historic chance" which the United States could not legitimately pass up.

"There is the possibility in a short time to free our common European home from a signficant share of the nuclear burden," Soviet journalist Tomas Kolesnichenko said on the television program "International Panorama."

Broadcast media and the Tass news agency also highlighted statements from foreign leaders backing the new Soviet proposal.

The media reaction, similar to previous campaigns to marshal support for Kremlin positions, was clearly designed to put pressure on the United States to respond quickly to the Soviet offer. Gorbachev announced Saturday that the Soviets were willing to negotiate a separate accord with the United States on medium-range missiles in Europe. The Kremlin had previously linked such an agreement to a demand that the United States limit testing on its Strategic Defense Initiative, or "Star Wars."

Doors open to West, official says

BEIJING - Chinese Foreign Minister Wu Xueqian assured Secretary of State George Shultz on Sunday that China would keep its door to the West open, but said improving relations would take "arduous efforts" by both sides.

At a welcoming banquet in the Great Hall of the People less than two months after China began a campaign against Western liberal ideas, Wu said, "The forces that favor continued growth in Sino-U.S. relations are growing in strength."

Shultz, the first senior U.S. official to visit China since the campaign began in January, stressed expanded commercial ties as "an important impetus for the modernization of our respective economies" and a path to expanded relations.

"It is important that we remain open to each other as we seek to further strengthen our relationship," Shultz said. "The peoples of our two countries have benefited from the success of our efforts to reduce barriers between our very different societies.'

REGIONAL

Lobbyist denounces death penalty

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Reinstating the death penalty is like legalizing revenge, William Lucero, a lobbyist from Topeka, said Saturday at a day-long Midwest regional conference of Amnesty International. Why do we kill people who kill people to show people who kill people that killing people is wrong?" Lucero asked.

Lucero joined about 50 area and regional members of the human rights organization who met at Rockhurst College to plan strategies against the death penalty, which has been approved by the Kansas House and has been passed to the Senate.

Lucero, state coordinator for the Kansas Coalition Against the Death Penalty, said killing a convicted killer would not deter other criminals, and he contended that the penalty usually is racially unfair. But mostly, Lucero said, it does not help ease the pain of victims' families. He said he did not want revenge when he learned his father had been murdered more than 14 years ago.

To attract attention to his stance against the death penalty, Lucero fasted last week, consuming only water, tea and juice. He said the fast would demonstrate that the death penalty was so expensive that it would take food out of people's mouths."

Florida 'out' for spring vacationers

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. - Frolicking college students, who for decades made this city synonymous with spring break, this year seem to be opting for other, less notorious vacation spots.

"The bottom line is that both today's college student and today's Fort Lauderdale have changed," said June Switkin, Broward Tourist Development Council executive director. "They are no longer the perfect match they were in the '50s, '60s and '70s.'

College students in search of sun and sand say they've switched to Daytona Beach, or the more exotic Barbados, Bermuda, the County officials have not promoted spring break in Fort Lauderdale in recent years and have been concerned about the negative publicity generated by widespread drinking and wild behavior that led to several fatal accidents.

Police crackdowns have turned off some students, who say they don't feel wanted in Fort Lauderdale. Police made 2,506 arrests during last year's spring break.

Two students die in cave accident

LUANA, Iowa - Storm waters flooded a cave where seven people from a college recreation program were exploring, trapping two cavers who died of cold before they could be reached Sunday.

A leader of the expedition died after apparently returning to the freezing cave in an unsuccessful attempt to save a colleague, according to the father of one of the survivors.

Cathy McClusky, an assistant professor of geology and physical education at Grinnell College, apparently escaped from the cave along with three students, but returned to help rescue two remaining students and Mike Price, an employee in the college's computer services division.

"We understand that she went back to try to save the others," said Bill Andreas in a telephone interview Sunday night from his home in Newton. Andreas' son, Jonathan was one of the students who escaped

The five student members of the cave expedition were not seriously injured, but declined to talk to reporters Sunday.

"The cave is in a dry creek bed, and when it began raining, sleeting and snowing, water began pouring in there," said sheriff's Deputy Gary Darling.

Police reached the cave 30 minutes after the first three cavers called the school, but none was equipped to descend into the cavern, described as one of the deepest in Iowa, dropping off 107 feet before branching out in long tunnels.

Speaker cites threat of pornography

By SHELLY SHAFFER Collegian Reporter

Pornography is a threat to women's safety, said Sandra Coyner, women's studies program director, at Friday Focus on

Coyner and Wally Hankley, graduate student in curriculum and instruction, spoke on the feminist and conservative perspectives on pornography as part of a prelecture forum for Evalina Kane's Lou Douglas Lecture titled "The Impact of Pornography on the Safe-ty and Status of Women and Children."

Kane will speak at 7:30 p.m. March 10 in Union Forum Hall.

"I believe pornography we see today affects the safety of women in today's society," Coyner said.

While viewing non-violent sex does not affect a person's behavior and attitude, viewing sexual violence does, she said. People become desensitized to violent acts after watching them. The classic rape myth is women enjoy rape, Coyner said. The core myth of pornography is that forcing sex on a woman is good for her and turns her on; she enjoys it and wants more. That is a lie, she said. A general definition of pornography is any explicit sex, Hankley said. The difference between feminist and reactionist views on pornography is caused by a different interpretation of the word pornography.

Feminists believe loving sex is not pornographic, but violent sex is, Coyner said.

sexual mores to be more conservative, Hankley said. "The problem (with pornography) is the violence, not the sex," Coyner said. The pornography industry and its definition of pornography are changing and so are Americans' ideas about it, she said.

Coyner said in the early 1970s, magazines such as Playboy and great literary books such as "Lady Chatterley's Lover" were considered pornographic. Reactionists want America to return to this perspective.

Pornography has greatly increased since then. Recent material is more graphic and includes violence against women in a sexual connotation, she said. Modern attitudes about sexual crease in pornography, Coyner said. Because of obscenity laws in the early '70s, producers of pornographic material practiced selfcensorship. Currently, the legal status quo is that virtually nothing is prosecuted on the basis of obscenity, she said.

Both feminists and conservatives agree that society needs to do something about sexual violence, Coyner said.

"Young people who look at naked people should see them loving each other, not beating each other," she

Although the feminist and conservative groups view pornography differently, Hankley said, the groups need to communicate. They are working in the same direction and could try to balance each other.

State provides solution for art studio flooding

By LORI LINDSTROM . Collegian Reporter

The state has provided $45,500 to raise thresholds at the four entrances of West Memorial Stadium to prevent future flooding problems of art studios in the building.

Whenever three or more inches of rain fall within a 20-hour period, the water west of the campus drains into West Stadium," said Jack Watson, supervisor of the University Physical Plant. "The ground just can't soak up all the water."

University Physical Facilities started building barriers at the entrances of the stadium in January and plan to finish by mid-March, Watson said. One entrance will have a ramp for handicapped accessibility, and the other three will have

It is hard to place a value on the amount of damage done by flooding, said Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art. Flooding at West Stadium causes immediate destruction to the art studios and building and residual deterioration that surfaces years later.

The water causes the elements of a kiln to rust or its electrical controls to deteriorate over a period of two to three years, he said.

Stroh said he was pleased the University is taking some action to prevent future flooding.

'(It's) probably all the University could do until the city of Manhattan does something about the sewerage system," he said.

The problem has been studied for 20 years, said City Manager Don Harmon, but there are no answers, and the city can do nothing. Harmon said the flooding has not caused any real property damage. Although the sewerage system is not adequate for proper drainage by West Stadium, it would not be cost-effective to improve it, he said. The "box" for the sewerage system would have to be twice the current size to solve the problem, Harmon said. To replace the system would mean demolishing the stadium.

Rex Replogle, associate professor of art, said the floods warp the floors of West Stadium and damage the melt furnaces, arc welders and kilns. He said he did not know of a dollar amount of damage done by the floods, but that cost is added to the expense of cleaning up the silt.

During the last flood in spring 1985. students were wading in three feet of water to unplug kilns, Replogle said. Therefore, a safety factor is also involved with the improvements the University is making to the entrances.

Even though the University is "damming up" the entrances, Replogle said water may enter the stadium, but not in the damaging amounts of past floods.

House to consider relief bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - Congressman and actors will spend a cold night sleeping outdoors on grates around the nation's capital this week as the House takes up a $500 million relief measure for the homeless.

The "sleepout" on heating grates near federal government buildings follows two months of hearings during which homeless families, psychiatrists, nutritionists, social workers, housing industry representatives and homeless activist Mitch Snyder have tried to spotlight the plight of homeless Americans.

Snyder, who has fasted to neardeath in past efforts to draw attention to his cause, has taken House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, and other congressmen on tours of the homeless shelter he operates at the bottom of Capitol Hill.

He has also invited them to the Capitol parking lot where his Community for Creative Non-Violence serves hot meals each night.

With national publicity and House passage of the homeless bill this week a virtual certainty, Snyder's $500 million would aid poor campaign appears to be bearing fruit.

"It's a combination of the efforts of people like ourselves, the sheer magnitude of the problem and the media focus. Those three things together are pretty potent," Snyder said Sunday.

'We don't think the president is in any position to veto legislation for the homeless.'

- Mitch Snyder

"Jim Wright has made a lot of difference as well," Snyder added.

The House Democratic leadership has gone all-out on the homeless issue, introducing the $500 million relief measure itself. Majority whip Tony Coelho, D-Calif., whose post is the third-highest in the House, is among those who will sleep on a grate Tuesday night.

He'll be joined by several other congressmen including Reps. Joseph Kennedy, D-Mass., Mike. Lowry, D-Wash., and Esteban Torres, D-Calif. Among the actors enlisted so far are Martin Sheen and Dennis Quaid.

The House has scheduled action Wednesday and Thursday on the relief measure authorizing $500 million in emergency food and shelter, transitional housing, outpatient health services and conversion of surplus public buildings.

The House Banking Committee last week approved on a unanimous voice vote the components under its jurisdiction: $100 million for renovation of underused public buildings, $70 million for charitable organizations and local governments that run food and shelter programs, $30 million for transitional housing such as group homes, $100 million for emergency shelters and $100 million for rental subsidy "certificates" under the federal government's lowincome housing program.

But Democrats and Republicans on the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which has jurisdiction over health care, split over the $100 million sought for the emergency outpatient health care programs. The panel approved the money on a 26-16 party-line vote, with Republicans objecting that states and localities should shoulder more of the cost burden.

No similar bill has been introduced in the Senate yet, although committee aides said draft legislation will be circulated among senators this week.

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., chairman of the Senate Banking subcommittee on housing and urban affairs, has resisted pressure from Snyder to endorse the House proposal. He said last month that the president probably would veto a $500 million bill for the homeless because Administration spokesmen have echoed Cranston's warning about a veto, and said the current federal response to the homeless problem is adequate.

"We don't think the president is in any position to veto legislation for the homeless," Snyder said Sunday.

Proposed tuition hike may cost state money

If legislators see fit to approve a proposal tabled on Thursday, K-State students will see a tuition hike of 20 percent next fall.

The effort is directed toward a policy that determines the overall fee-cost ratio at Regents' institutions at 25 percent.

Legislators Thursday said they support maintaining the general ratio percentage but want out-ofstate students to pay even more of the students' 25 percent.

While sometimes it is true raising tuition rates generates more revenue, there appears a serious flaw in logic in this case.

Mark Tallman, director of legislative affairs for Associated Students of Kansas, said University of Kansas' ratio was higher than K-State's because it has more out-of-state and graduate students. Thus, the student population at KU pays about 5 percent more than K-State students.

Many out-of-state students attend Kansas institutions "because it's less expensive."

If it suddenly becomes more expensive for an out-of-state student to attend school in Kansas, it stands to reason the state will lose a high number of potential students.

If Kansas loses out-of-state students, it is equally obvious to see the effect would be a loss in revenue - the loss of revenue resulting in a lower student feecost ratio, not a higher one.

City's 'Berlin Wall' is ugly symbol of hatred

Many will be happy to hear that no right to tear it down. the city of New Orleans has bulldozed down a barrier - aptly referred to as "The Berlin Wall" - which separated a black New Orleans neighborhood from a mostly white suburb.

However, before anyone concludes that all is well in New Orleans, the council of Jefferson Parish, the white suburb, has voted to erect the barrier again. The residents claim that black residents living nearby in New Orleans are driving into the suburb at night and burglarizing homes and assaulting residents.

The chairman of the Jefferson Parish Council insists the barrier is on the suburb's side of the border and therefore the city has

"He has no right to lock my people in," was the response from New Orleans Mayor Sidney Barthelemy.

The existence of the barrier is not the real issue. The issue is that the barrier symbolizes segregational, outdated ideas ideas this country has tried for so long to put out of the minds of its people. The very idea that the barrier - made of strips of steel attached to wooden posts - is termed "The Berlin Wall" tells of the feelings the people have and what the wall represents.

It is unfortunate the people of Jefferson Parish would want to live and raise children in the shadow of such an ugly symbol.

Involvement

Students can make difference

One of the most terrifying experiences must be waiting for your first job or internship interview. After buying your suit and wondering if you have dressed conservatively enough, terror sets in as you begin to wonder what questions the interviewer

This was one of my biggest fears until I experienced my first internship interview. To my surprise, after we had established that I did have a legal alien card, all we really talked about was my campus activity involvement. I really have enjoyed these activities and continue to enjoy them now. But the realization that these activities could pay off so early didn't become apparent until my first interview.

I realize that getting involved in these kind of activities can be quite frustrating. It seems that you have to have experience to get involved. But where do you get the experience in the first place? (Sounds like another bad community college advertise-

One of the best opportunities, besides your own departmental clubs, is student government. Now, before you close your mind and turn to the crossword, just wait a minute. If you are under the impression that the same people who were involved in student council at your high school now make up student government then you are wrong. Most of those types went on to be prom king and queen and either go to the University of Kansas or hold a steady job at Burger King. Student government has a much broader base at K-State with people representing many different views and lifestyles. It's also one of the few places on campus, besides my philosophy class, where conservatives and liberals get together and have to listen to each other.

But how do you get involved in student government at the ground level? The easiest way is to apply for a University or Student Senate committee. These committees are composed of faculty, student senators and at-

The University committees span the entire range of campus activities. One example would be the Basketball Ticket Sales Committee, which advises the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics regarding ticket sales. Another would be the University Activities Board, which examines the eligibility of student groups to be registered with the University and use the University facilities. There are 19 of these committees requiring at-large members and applications for positions are due Friday.

There are no experience prerequisites required for these types of positions. Of course, any experience wouldn't hurt, but it is the input you can share due to your particular background that helps these committees serve the entire student body. You can find a complete list of these committee titles and their responsibilities in the Student Government Services office. If you haven't visited the office, it can be found by the automatic teller machines in the Union. If that doesn't help, look for that tacky mobile in the Union; the entrance is right there.

The next group of committees with atlarge members are Student Senate committees. One example is the Senate Operations Committee. Its responsibilities include editing proposed legislation before it reaches the Senate Floor. This is a great opportunity to monitor what is coming before the Senate. Another choice is State and Community Affairs. This committee will be closely watching the Aggieville situation for next year's K-State-KU game. Both of these committees require five at-large student members. Watch the Collegian for deadline dates.

Another group of committees are those involved with the Judicial Branch. One example in this category is the Traffic Appeals Board, which hears student appeals to traffic and security situations. The other committees in the Judicial Branch are the Judicial Council, Tribunal and Student Review Board. These applications are also due this Friday.

All these committees can "get your feet wet" in campus activities. If you are interested in serving as a Student Senator in the future, you can gain some valuable background experience and make great connections to make the job easier. The interaction this type of involvement offers is also a great warm-up for the professional world.

Involvement in student government can be quite rewarding. Our format is the envy of many of our peer institutions. Stop by the office if you haven't before. Your student senators serve their office hours during the day and can be contacted on the Senate Hotline, 532-7777, if you have any questions.

If these types of committees can begin to parallel the diversity of the students we have on this campus, then we can become all the more effective. The amount of time involved is minimal so don't worry about sacrificing a letter grade to become involved. So why not give it a try? You could meet some new people, have something to talk about in an interview and share your input concerning decisions that affect us all.

Various award winners named

Up until now, I have resisted the urge to give out awards to people for their achievements or lack thereof. But the real fun of awards is not receiving them, but giving them out. Here are just a few:

—The I Don't Remember Award to Ronald Reagan. Here is a person who can recall the most obscure quotes and amazing stories about welfare queens (so obscure that no one else can find them) but can't remember doing something so damaging and possibly illegal as authorizing a shipment of arms to Iran in 1985. The president is truly a legend in his own mind.

-The McCarthy Award to former White House Communications Director Patrick Buchanan. His red-baiting tactics were so blatant and insulting the rest of the Reagan administration cringed whenever he opened his mouth. In Buchanan's eyes, anyone to the left of Adolf Hitler is a Communist. To him I say good riddance.

-The Look, We're a Democracy, So Where's Our Military Aid? Award to the government of Guatemala. After more than 30 years of military rule, a civilian president was allowed to take office in an effort to make the country more attractive to the U.S. Congress. Even the new president admits the real power still rests with the military. Congress gave them military aid with which they have used to kill 50,000 civilians in the last six years. Maybe this new aid will help them speed up their quest to destroy any political opposition that might still exist.

-The I am the Constitution Award to Attorney General Edwin Meese. This person seems to think that he alone has the power to interpret the Constitution, even though it says that is the Supreme Court's job. Meese's opinions on many issues fly in the face of the basic freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution. With a megalomaniac like Meese running around Washington, the Russians are the urinalysis testing. A pet project of Ed Meese. Other than the obvious constitutional problems with this sort of testing (probable cause, protection from self-incrimination, etc.), if everyone has to give a urine sample, then who's going to test them?

—The Backfire Award to the makers of the mini-series "Amerika." In an attempt at revenge for "The Day After," the producers of "Amerika" came up with a piece of pro-paganda so obvious that the Soviet Union is trying to get the rights to show the program to their people to show them just how crazy Americans are. If it wasn't so utterly boring, this could become a cult classic like that other propaganda classic "Reefer

-The Longest Wait for the Shortest Resignation Award to former Chief of Staff Donald Regan. After months of speculation, Regan finally stepped down. It seemed that no one wanted him there, even Nancy Reagan. He finally left after hearing he had been replaced on television, prompting the shortest resignation letter in history. After all, he had already been there too long.

—The I Dare You Award to Mikhail Gorbachev. After daring the United States to join them in a nuclear test ban, Reagan did what he is good at - ignoring good advice. Score one for Mickey. -The I Dare You Award, Honorable Mention, to Libyan leader Col. Moammar Gadhafi. He dared the United States to cross his "line of death." It did. Just goes to show

Americans will take a dare if they get to blow up something.

-The I Have Had Enough of This Award to former National Security Adviser Robert McFarlane. He left the Reagan administration only to be called back to help in the Ira-nian arms deal. His suicide attempt didn't inspire public confidence in Reagan. But as author Hunter S. Thompson said, "Hell, everyone can do 30 Valiums.

-The Where Did the Party Go Award to Thompson, author of such works as "Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas." During a recent appearance at the University of Kansas, days. The 1980s are just too serious for him.
Where did all the laid-back druggies go?
Everybody today is smoking crack. But Thompson would just "prefer some serious acid." Thompson reminisced about the good ol'

-The Big Brother in Training Award to the KSU Police Department. Its photographing of campus demonstrations is sure to attract the top talent scouts from the FBI and CIA, but it needs to keep its surveillance more secret. When people found out about the surveillance file, the department was forced to stop the practice. Now it will just have to find another way to keep those people with divergent political views "in line."

-The Frankenstein's Monster Award to Lt. Col. Oliver North. What more can you say about him? Where did this crazed fanatic come from? Did someone clone some bad Joe McCarthy cells? All these questions and more will be answered if Ollie stops taking ...

These are just a few of the people I think deserve to be recognized. Some of you may have noticed there are not many awards for doing positive activities. That's because an award for doing something good is not as important as one for doing bad. Besides, that's all the fun of giving out awards in the first

Man uses 'snowshoe' ladders in rescue of icebound canine

By The Associated Press

DOVER, Idaho - It resembled a Keystone Cops episode, but three rescuers using a pair of ladders, a rowboat and an inner tube finally managed to rescue Rudie from the icy Pend Oreille River.

Rudie, part black Labrador and part German shepherd, fell into the water Friday when he ran out to the edge of the ice and the ice gave way.

Jeff Wilder of Clark Fork spotted the struggling dog, grabbed an inner tube and went to the rescue.

Sliding on his belly on the tube, Wilder also broke through the ice and

Then, Mitch Davenport pushed an aluminum rowboat across the ice and hauled Wilder and the dog aboard.

But with his wet, shivering passengers in the boat, Davenport couldn't get back across the ice.

Next on the scene was Sandpoint Fire Department Capt. Ken Lunde, called with six other firefighters by Wilder's wife, on whose bed Rudie was born 21/2 years ago. Lunde grabbed a pair of ladders off a fire truck and set out across the ice, using them like an enormous pair of snowshoes.

Lady Cats, Kansas to battle for tourney title

By CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

SALINA - How appropriate it is that the K-State and Kansas women's basketball teams are going to play for the Big Eight Tournament Championship the first year that Salina has hosted the tournament.

Kansas and K-State, each with one victory against its intrastate rival, will battle it out for the Big Eight crown and a berth into the NCAA Tournament 7 p.m. Monday at the Bicentennial Center in Salina.

K-State helped set up the All-Kansas finale by soundly defeating Oklahoma, 79-64, in Saturday's opening-round game. The Lady Cats came alive Sunday in the closing minutes of their semifinal matchup against Missouri to defeat the Lady Tigers, 78-61. It was Missouri's second loss to K-State in the last seven days.

Kansas advanced to the final round of the tournament by beating Iowa State, 73-67, Saturday, Sunday, the Lady Jayhawks held on to a halftime lead and slid past Nebraska,

"We have to control the tempo and force (KU) into a half-court game to win," said

'The pressure is really on them (to win),' she added. If Kansas, 18-12, loses, it is doubtful they will be invited to the NCAA Tourna-

The Lady Cats appear to have much better odds of getting a berth if they lose tonight. "With 22 wins it's going to be awful hard for the (NCAA tournament selection committee) to overlook us," she added. NCAA bids will be awarded Sunday, K-State's Sports Information Director Duane DaPron said.

Kansas and K-State split their two games in the regular season. K-State won in overtime, 71-65, in the first meeting in Manhattan. In Lawrence, the Lady Jayhawks held off a late scoring drive by the Lady Cats and emerged with a 68-63 win.

"I can't worry about Kansas State," said Kansas Coach Marian Washington. "I just have to think about what we're going to do. We just have to do what we do best and if we can do that we'll stay in the game.

"K-State has played really great ball down the stretch. The way they played (against Missouri), we are going to have to play good defense and make them earn everything,"

Second-half run dumps Missouri Tigers, 78-61

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

SALINA - If ever a final score was deceiving, Sunday's 78-61 final score of K-State's semifinal win over Missouri in the women's Big Eight Conference Postseason Tournament was just that.

Until the 7:31 mark of the second half, both teams fought hard inside and traded leads. But at that point, with Missouri holding on to a 58-55 lead, something strange happened.

K-State went on an unbelievable 23-3 run to turn what was actually a struggle into a cakewalk. The Lady Cats also secured themselves a place in tonight's championship game against the Kansas Jayhawks.

"I can't tell you what happened in the last three and a half minutes. All I know is that we were down by one and then I looked up and we were ahead by 17," Lady Cats' coach Matilda Mossman said.

Missouri Coach Joann Rutherford had a more detailed explanation.

"In the last few minutes, the momentum shifted and then we started forcing shots and had some turnovers," Rutherford said.

"The whole thing came down to when we were up by three, we should have gone up by you can change in five days." five and we didn't. Then we missed two front ends of one-and-one situations and had a couple of turnovers that really hurt," she said.

The bipartisan K-State crowd of 4,825 was held at the edge of its seats for most of the game as neither team was able to put the other away.

In the first half, Missouri built an early 19-13 lead, but that was to be the biggest lead by either team until the Lady Cats' big run at

The Lady Tigers went with what got them here in the second half, and that was their powerful inside game led by senior Renee Kelly. After only scoring five points in the first half, Kelly, this year's Big Eight Player of the Year, came alive to finish with 16 points and nine rebounds before fouling out with 2:37 left.

Lady Cat center Sue Leiding said she tried to do what K-State's coaches had asked her to do prior to the game.

"We wanted to front them (Kelly and Renee Dozier) inside," Leiding said. "They (the coaches) just told us to get in front of Renee Kelly, and that is what kept going through my mind."

"We knew they would force it inside," Mossman said They did that a lot on Wednesday (when K-State beat Missouri 90-81 in Manhattan) and there is not much

K-State's track teams finish 2nd, 3rd at Big Eight finals

By DAVE WAGNER Sports Writer

Ron Stahl and Kenny Harrison highlighted the Big Eight Conference's indoor track championships for the K-State men this weekend in Lincoln, Neb.

Long- and triple-jump favorite Harrison and distance-runner Stahl each recorded dual championships that carried the men's team to a third-place finish behind Nebraska and Oklahoma.

The men's title was captured by Nebraska for the second time in the past three years.

K-State's women gave Nebraska - indoor champions for the last nine years - a run for the money, finishing second just 12 points behind the Lady 'Huskers.

"It was a day when everything just clicked for the women,' Capriotti said. "We scored 25 points more than I thought we could. Every time I looked at the scores, we got more points.'

Stahl earned MVP honors for his victories in the the two-mile and three-mile runs and his anchor leg in the distance medley relay. Capriotti said it was his performance in the relay that gave Stahl the MVP honors over Kenny Har-

Stahl received the baton for the final one-mile leg a half lap behind the leaders and managed to catch up to within one second of them for a third-place finish.

"Kenny could have just as easily won the athlete of the meet award," Capriotti said. "If it wasn't for Ron doing so well, he would have."

Harrison, an All-American in the triple jump and the long jump, captured those events. The two victories brought Harrison's running total of Big Eight indoor and outdoor championships to nine.

He won the long jump Friday evening, leaping 25 feet, 4 inches on his first attempt, but chose to jump two more times "just to get ready for the triple jump.

In the triple jump he was again winning by four feet with a 54 feet, 3 despite being laid up in bed earlier in the week with the flu.

"I've been in bed all week and came up early Thursday just so I could get settled in," Harrison said. "It wasn't really a great jump (in the long jump), but I'm happy with it because I won. It was hard getting motivated knowing I was jumping two feet farther than anyone else in the long jump and five feet in the triple jump."

Harrison was scheduled to run in the mile relay, the last event of the meet, which could have moved the men's team into second place overall if they had beaten Oklahoma. K-State lost that chance, though, when Aaron Roberson false started and disqualified the team from that event.

"I'm pretty much disappointed," Harrison said. "I didn't put forth my best effort (in the long jump and triple jump) to save up for the mile relay, and then we ended up not even running the race."

"That really hurt," Capriotti said. "We could have won the race in that time (a 3:14.85 by Nebraska).'

K-State's women gave a near flawless performance in the twoday event, rallying to make up for the loss of sprinter Joy Jones perhaps one of the fastest sprinters in the conference.

"We don't deal with the negatives on this team," Capriotti said. "Instead of worrying about not having Joy, they got together and said 'we've got to do something about

K-State's women captured three individual titles and had strong support with several second- and thirdplace finishes.

Pinkie Suggs won the gold in the shot put, throwing a conference record 53-21/2 inches while Karen Brown won the 300-yard dash and Chris Vanatta won the three-mile Others placing for the women were Anita Isom, third in the 1,000-yard run; Dimita Jones, third in the 880-yard run; and Betsy Silzer, third in the two-mile run.

'Cats pull off year's biggest upset as K-Ŝtate stuns Oklahoma 90-89

By JEFF RAPP Sports Writer

The Wildcats may have pulled off the upset of the season Friday night when they came back from a late nine-point deficit to stun the Oklahama Sooners, 90-89, in Norman.

The game appeared to be just another valiant effort for K-State, who had an 0-5 record against the top three teams in the Big Eight Conference going into Friday's contest. In fact, until the 1:10 mark in the final half, all the familiar signs pointed to another respectable K-State loss.

"I thought we battled good. The fight was better than it's been. I think they believed a little stronger that good things would happen," Coach Lon Kruger said.

Good things did happen - especially in the waning minutes of the game.

With 1:10 left and K-State down by nine, freshman guard Steve Henson calmly pitched in a three-pointer from the top of the key.

Norris Coleman, who didn't start the game and played only 28 minutes, then collected the last three of his 21 points as he was fouled when he hit a 12-foot jumper. Coleman converted on the free throw and cut the OU lead to three, 89-86.

Then it was time for Mitch Richmond to take over.

Richmond pulled down an offensive rebound and layed it back in with 16 seconds left. Henson then took a sprint dribble down the court after consecutive K-State and Oklahoma timeouts. He dealt Richmond the ball 18 feet to the left of the basket.

Richmond responded with the gamewinning shot with two seconds remaning on the clock.

That was Kruger's strategy. Kruger said his instructions in the team huddle with 15 seconds left during an Oklahoma timeout were, "Just get it to Mitch."

"We wanted to get the ball in Mitch's hands anywhere from 15-20 feet away off the high post. Mark (Dobbins) got the inbounds pass, got it to Steve (Henson) and then Steve got it to where it was supposed to be. Then Mitch finished it," Kruger said.

Oklahoma head coach Billy Tubbs found an excuse for his team's loss. OU dropped to third in the Big Eight at 7-5 and finished 21-8 overall counting Sunday's one-point loss to

"It was a very unusual game. They (the officials) choked to death on their whistles," Tubbs said. "I felt like with a minute to go we wouldn't get (the win). I didn't think (the officials) would let us."

The win broke an 11-game K-State losing streak against the Sooners, and was Tubbs first loss to K-State in Norman. K-State was also only the second team in 65 games to beat the Sooners on their home floor. The last team to do it was Kansas last season, 72-70.

running out, the team still had confidence in its ability to win. "We really thought we were going to win.

Junior center Ron Meyer said with time

We had played Missouri tight, played Kansas tight and Oklahoma tight. We knew what kind of team we had, but we hadn't proved it. Other people's expectations fell, but ours never did," Meyer said. Kruger said the win would give the 'Cats a much-needed boost going in to the Big Eight Conference's postseason tournament. We've been saying for the last 10 days that we need something good to happen,' Kruger said. "We felt good about our intensity, we felt good about our attitude, but yet we've been shaken in our confidence. Certainly this will be a big lift." K-State, fourth in the conference at 8-6 and 18-9 overall, will play its first tournament game against fifth-place Nebraska at 12:10 p.m. Friday in Kemper Arena, Kansas City,

Wildcats pound Missouri Western twice

By JENNY CHAULK Sports Writer

Something one doesn't see often happened at Frank Myers Field Sunday. K-State baseball coach Mike Clark had a reunion of sorts. He went head-to-head with his college coach, Doug Minnis of Missouri Western State College. Clark's Wildcats prevailed in the double-header, winning 6-2 and 9-2, "It was different," said Clark of the coaching battle. "I didn't try to figure out. what he was going to do, though, because he'll fool you."

Nothing the Griffons tried could fool K-State. As Clark said, the Wildcats "did what we wanted to do.'

"We showed diversity," he said. "We won the first game with the long ball and the second one with our speed."

K-State second baseman Leo Seiler stepped to the plate in the second inning of game one and hit a two-run home run.

Before the game ended, first baseman Otto-Kaifes hit his 10th career home run, center fielder Mike Hinkle collected a triple, and third baseman Jim Donahue and left fielder Russ Ringgenberg chipped in Rocky Ferguson was the starting pitcher in the game and gave up two hits in five innings. Marty Darnell pitched in relief and gave up one hit.

None of the three Missouri Western hits resulted in its two runs, however. Errors were responsible for allowing Griffon runners to score unearned runs in the third and fourth innings.

Errors plagued K-State in 1986, when they finished 24-34 overall and 5-19 in the Big Eight Conference. Clark said he has been stressing fielding in practice in hopes there will not be a repeat of last season when K-State set a school record for errors

K-State loosened up in the second game, taking a first-inning 3-0 lead and dominating the rest of the way.

Ringgenberg lead off with a six was driven in by right fielder Tony Braddock's single — a shot drilled between first and second bases. Hinkle drove Braddock in with another single and then scored on a Griffon wild pitch

K-State's hot hitting continued throughout the rest of the game. The Wildcats collected 13 hits in the conte

Jeff Peterson was on the mound for K-State in the second game. Clark said he struggled for a bit, but "made the good pitch when he had to."

pitch when he had to."

Peterson loaded the bases in both the third and fourth innings. In the third inning, catcher Jeff Hulse squelched a Missouri Western rally by throwing out a Griffon runner leading off third base.

K-State was scheduled to open its season Saturday with Friends University. The double-header was postponed because of rain and will be played at 1 p.m. Tuesday at Frank Myers Field.

40-34, early in the second stanza, but Missouri came right back to seize the lead. The Lady Tigers had leads of three points six times, but never could widen the margin.

With Missouri holding a 58-55 lead, K-State committed three straight fouls, with the last sending Missouri's Renay Daughtery to the line to shoot a one-and-one. Daughtery missed the first, and then K-State's fun started.

Carlisa Thomas, who became K-State's alltime assist leader after dishing out might last night, hit a 12-footer with 6:06 remaining to get the fun started. Thomas scored seven points during the big K-State run.

The sound of dribbling basketballs, yells and laughter echoed from Manhattan City Auditorium Saturday as more than 20 mentally handicapped children participated in a class project of seven K-State students.

Group leader Mike Claflin, junior in secondary education, said the project, EXCEL, stands for exceptional experiences collaborating with education and learning. The project is part of the Exceptional Child in the Regular Classroom class at K-State and involves an observation of mentally handicapped children, Claflin

"I wanted an activity that involved a lot of kids," he said. "So I got my idea from the basketball camps that (University of Kansas Caskettell AMERICA'S STEAK EXPERT

U.S. dioceses readying for summer papal visit

By The Associated Press

One of the hottest tickets in the country this year is a seat at one of the Masses which Pope John Paul II will celebrate in September.

Though stadiums may be full, they won't be sold out - the tickets are free. Local church officials are depending on the generosity of Roman Catholics and corporations to defray millions of dollars in expenses for the 10-day, nine-city visit.

"There are more than a million Catholics in this diocese. I am sure we will be able to come up with the money," said the Rev. Jose Nickse, the spokesman for the Archdiocese of Miami, where the costs are estimated at up to $2 million.

There was more trepidation in San Francisco, where the pope's two-day visit is anticipated to cost $4 million.
"When you have a special collection in an archdiocese like ours, $50,000 would be a big collection. That's a little piece of a million dollars," said the Rev. Miles Riley, spokesman for the San Francisco Ar-

"But it really is very little money for the impact of the visit," he added. "It's $2 billion worth of publicity

The pope's tentative schedule begins in Miami on Sept. 10, then to Columbia, S.C., New Orleans, San Antonio, Texas, Phoenix, Los Angeles, Monterey, Calif., San Francisco and Detroit. The pope departs for Rome on Sept. 19.

Arrangements are being made now for security, media coverage and hotel rooms in the cities. Half a year before the pope's second extended visit to this country, the church is already saying "no" to some demands for tickets or a few minutes of the pontiff's time.

The diocese has 295,000 members. and 76,000 seats for a mass at Sun Devil Stadium. Rather than sell tickets, the diocese hopes to raise nearly $1 million, plus $300,000 to spruce up St. Mary's Basilica, through private and corporate donations, and by a special collection in every parish church this month.

Diocesan officials in San Antonio reported raising about $500,000 of the required $2.5 million. "We're right on target," said Bishop Charles V. Grahmann of Victoria Financing is a particular pinch for the small diocese of Monterey, which is trying to raise $2 million. The diocese had proposed seeking bids for rights to televise the pope's visit, but backed down last month after broadcasters protested.

LAUREL, Miss. - Residents and cleanup crews worked under a sunny sky Sunday to recover belongings and clear up wreckage from a tornado that left seven people dead, nearly 500 families homeless and millions of dollars in damage.

"Everybody is tired, but things are looking up," said Carl Carlos, Jones County Civil Defense director. "It's just a matter of cleanup and getting back on our feet now.'

The tornado left at least 145 people injured as it cut a 20-mile-long, 2-mile-wide path of destruction across mostly rural Jones County in southeastern Mississippi on Saturday morning.

Some residents camped out overnight at bonfires beside the piles of splintered lumber and brick that had been their homes, and the National Guard blocked off 15 roads and highways.

"It probably caused more damage in one county than I've ever seen,' said Gov. Bill Allain. "It looked more like a hurricane than it did a tornado because everything was so flattened

Carlos said it was fortunate that the tornado, part of a series of thunderstorms across the South, hit on a weekend and that residents had a 15-minute warning.

'Three schools were hard hit one in Glade destroyed," said Carlos. "Even if the kids had had a warning and gotten into sheltered areas there would have been a heavy loss of life because the school is just rubble."

Carlos said damage to the schools could run to $7.5 million and damage assessment teams sent in by the state should have an estimate ready by Monday. The storm skirted Laurel, a city of 21,000.

"The center of the storm was about two miles from the city, and we were very, very fortunate that the track wasn't a couple miles to the north or we would have been really hit hard,"

said Laurel Mayor Sam Lindsey. Jones County Coroner Henry Dobson said six fatalities were directly caused by the tornado. One other death of a heart attack was also related to the storm, he said.

The tornado carved a trail through the small communities of Glade, Powers, Tucker's Crossing, Jenkins and Mosselle on Saturday morning.

Ron Keen of Glade said that when he heard about the tornado warning he left his house to go next door to warn his uncle and aunt.

"As I walked out the door of my house, his trailer just exploded, Keen said. His uncle was killed.

Katherine Bradley, owner of a beauty salon next to her house in the Glade community, said she and two customers ran from the shop to her home as the storm approached.

"I can't tell you how that noise sounded. It was just awful. There's just no words to describe the sounds I heard," Bradley said. Most of her shop landed on the other side of a highway.

The weather service said the overall storm system, packing 45 mph wind, downed trees and power lines from Rankin County, near Jackson, to the Alabama border.

A survey by the Red Cross listed 219 single family homes, 114 mobile homes and one apartment complex destroyed. In all, 648 residences in the county were either destroyed or damaged. The Red Cross said 492 families were forced out of their homes because they were destroyed or damaged.

Most of the injured were located and taken to hospitals by about 4 p.m., Carlos said.

The accident occured in fine weather. The resort was crowded, as it was the end of a school vacation week in the Bordeaux region and the start of a school vacation in the Toulouse area.

The French Transport Ministry said an inquiry into the accident would be started immediately, and that Minister Jacques Douffiagues would call a meeting of safety officials, ski-lift constructors and

BOSTON - People perceive babyfaced adults as more likely to be negligent but less likely to be guilty of premeditated crimes when compared to adults with mature faces, according to a Brandeis University researcher. Leslie Zebrowitz McArthur, head of the Brandeis Psychology Department, said the findings are consistent with other research she has done on baby-faced adults that shows people tend to see them as more naive but more honest than adults with mature faces.

"There's been lot of evidence that first impressions are tied to facial appearances. But this phenomenon has not really received that much attention from researchers, perhaps in part because they don't like to acknowledge such unjust judgments," McArthur said.

McArthur said other work she has done indicates that people expect adults with childlike appearances to behave in somewhat childlike ways.

McArthur's research on reactions to baby-faced adults accused of crimes was conducted along with Diane Berry, a former graduate student who now is an assistant professor at Southern Methodist Univer-

French security rises after trial of terrorist

By The Associated Press

PARIS - The government strengthened security Sunday, fearing bombings might follow the sentencing of a Lebanese terrorist to life in prison.

But politicians from across the spectrum praised the sentence given to Georges Ibrahim Abdallah on Saturday for complicity in the 1982 murders of a U.S. and an Israeli diplomat. The Communists were the main dissenters.

Parisians interviewed by The Associated Press over the weekend generally supported the verdict, but some expressed fears it could lead to more terrorist at-

In September, random bombings aimed at forcing Abdallah's release killed 11 people in Paris and wounded 150.

"It's obvious that there are risks, but we mustn't be afraid," said businessman Francois Fumey.

Soldiers reinforced border patrols and moved into Paris airports to strengthen customs and police operations, inspecting freight zones for possible parcel bombs, French newspapers reported.

An extra 1,000 police who protected public areas and buildings in Paris during Abdallah's trial remained on duty.

Seven judges sitting as a special terrorism court rejected an emotional plea by prosecutor Pierre Baechlin to sentence Abdallah to no more than 10 years because of the threat of renewed terrorism.

Lawyers say Abdallah's life term means at least 15 years in jail. He was convicted of complicity in the 1982 Paris murders of Lt. Col. Charles Ray, the U.S. deputy military attache, and Israeli diplomat Yavov Barsimantov, and in the attempted murder of U.S. Consul-General Robert Homme in Strasbourg in Socialist Party Secretary-General Lionel Jospin said he thought the government tried to pressure the judges but the judges had to go on the facts.

Asked if Socialist President Francois Mitterrand might grant clemency to Abdallah, Jospin said Mitterrand would need a recommendation from the conservative government.

One of the bombs last September exploded in a popular restaurant on the Champs Elysees, killing an employee and two policemen.

Dominique Hertig, waiting in line for a movie on the Champs Elysees, said over the weekend: "Yes, there is fear. You think of it a bit, but it's very good he was found guilty. Too bad we don't have the death penalty."

Benefits of dual tracks in question

Greyhound owners, horsemen at odds

By The Associated Press

ABILENE - As Kansans move a step closer to the betting windows at race tracks, many greyhound breeders remain at odds with each other as well as horsemen and state

The first century of organized greyhound racing - a sport recorded as far back as 1886 on the Kansas prairie - was capped in November with a constitutional amendment allowing pari-mutuel wagering on dogs and horses.

Dickinson County breeders raise and train thousands of dogs annually. Their multimillion-dollar industry, which could get a boost from pari-mutuel racing, is an important segment of the economy in the Abilene area.

Last week the House approved a bill setting racing and betting guidelines. The Senate now must consider it before it is sent to Gov. Mike Hayden for approval.

The bill calls for a five-member commission to regulate racing. It also determines how money gambled at tracks will be divided, a section some contend is the key to whether both horses and dogs will race.

On standard bets, the state's share at greyhound tracks will be 5 percent. For horse tracks and those featuring both kinds of racing, the state will receive a tax of 3 percent and the track operator's share will be 2 percent more than at greyhoundonly facilities.

Many greyhound breeders and owners fear dual tracks will hurt their business by creating competition for racing dates and not allowing for a top-notch facility. They complain the tax break at dual tracks serves as an incentive to build them.

Others side with horse racing forces and claim that only by promoting dual tracks will both sports be available to Kansans.

"The public policy question is whether people get both kinds of racing," said Rep. Robert H. Miller, R-Wellington, the chairman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee. "We think it's the best approach to give the people what they expect.'

Some horsemen are concerned there is an effort under way to shut them out.

"We carried the battle to get this pari-mutuel bill on the ballot," said Dick Teichgraeber, president of the Kansas Quarter Horse Racing Association. "We didn't ask any favors of the dog industry, and we're

"We're glad the dual track option is being looked at," he added. 'That's the way Kansas should have it. We should promote both in-

Rep. Elaine Hassler, an Abilene Republican whose district contains dozens of greyhound farms, said opposition to dual tracks is mainly economic.

'The intrusion of the horse racing schedule from time to time causes the quality greyhound people to discontinue booking into that track because it's not available all the time," she said. "That attracts fewer people, and the whole income from the track deteriorates.'

One group, the Kansas Greyhound Owners for Economic Development, has come out against the lower tax on dual tracks. Wayne Ward, vice president of the KGOED, said developers shouldn't be encouraged to support horse racing at the expense of dog racing.

"Dog breeders and dog kennels feel that a year-round facility in a market like Kansas City could be the finest dog racing facility in the country, bar none," Ward said. "However it would be diluted, be it not having 52 weeks of racing or whatever else, it wouldn't be in the interest of greyhound owners," he

The National Greyhound Association, based in Abilene, shares the view that dual tracks are economically unsound. NGA officials also are concerned that the surface of a dual track wouldn't be suitable for both animals.

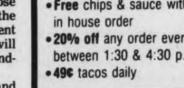

Gary Guccione, the association's administrator and secretarytreasurer, said just three dual tracks have operated recently in the United States or near its borders. Only one remains, he said.

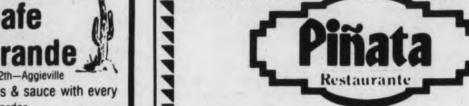

'We're being asked to subsidize horse racing...it's a compromise situation that won't be helpful to the greyhound industry," Guccione said.

Selling jerky 'beefs up' student's income by $5,000 a year

By STACEY CAMPBELL Collegian Reporter

While many students depend on scholarships, grants and loans to fund their college education, one sophomore in veterinary medicine pays for his education in a less traditional way — by selling beef jerky.

Rex Rammell, 26, receives the jerky from his family's processing plant in Tetonia, Idaho.

"My father thought that he could market the jerky commercially," Rammell said. "This is his way of helping me get through school."

Last fall he sold $5,000 worth of jerky. Some of the jerky is mailed to resalers and the remaining is sent to Rammell's home, where he distributes it. Rammell sells directly to K-State Concessions. He has distributors from Salina to Hays, and from Wamego to Topeka.

"I also sell jerky to vet students from my desk at school for 75 cents. It sells for 79 cents in the stores."

Rammell does most of his work on Saturdays, visiting his route and taking care of telephone correspondence.

"I personally went to people, asked if they would like to sell my jerky, and they gave it a try," Rammell

Rammell's grandfather started the family operation in the 1930s.

"My grandfather's uncle was a merchant and he got my grandfather interested in the grocery business," he said. "In the '50s, my grandfather, my uncle and my father started a slaughter house in

His father, brother and another employee now process the meat.

"The processing plant is a family tradition," Rammell said. "My father has built himself a name by processing meat, jerky, salami and especially wild meats."

The jerky is made from lean beef that is boned out, a process that removes all bones from the cut of meat. It is then ground and spices are added. The ground beef is then stamped into pre-fixed jerky pieces, placed on a wire tray and put in the smokehouse for 10 to 12 hours, he

"It's a 24-hour process to cook and dry a batch of 1,000 sticks of jerky. It probably takes three days to get the meat ground and packaged and then shipped to me," Rammell said. "(But) once I got established, (the jerky operation) only takes two to

"I want to increase the profit from selling jerky to $500 per month, which will make me gross $5,000 sales per month," he said.

Rammell said his experience with meats goes back to his childhood. "I am a meat cutter, so I'm trained to cut meat. We (Rammell and his brother) used to skin deer, elk and moose after school."

The jerky, made of lean beef, is sold under the name of "Rammell's Moose Brand."

Rammell said his father gave the jerky its brand name during a time when he was involved in an investigation.

"My father had a run-in with the federal government, and he was involved with an undercover federal investigation over the processing of an illegally killed moose," Rammell said. "At that time he was looking for a name for his jerky, and that's where the name comes from.

"I'm interested in horses and cattle. There is a good chance that I'll go back to the Rocky Mountains," he said. "I want to survive on my own as a veterinarian. But if the beef jerky future looks bright, I'm sure I'll be selling it."

Hashem who was replaced last summer in the Amal command structure, said his supporters seized Amal offices throughout south Lebanon except the market town of Nabatiyeh, 37 miles southeast of Beirut.

He said in a communique issued at his hometown of Marwanieh in south Lebanon that his forces had laid seige to Nabatiyeh, where Berri's two main commanders, Mahmoud Faqih and Abu Jamal, were reportedly holding out.

Reporters in Tyre, Lebanon's southernmost port, said by telephone that Berri's militia were in full command of that city and its environs, and that 13 mutinous militiamen had been arrested by Berri's supporters. Reporters in Sidon, the provincial capital of the south, said, however, that Hashem's fighters control Lebanon's southern coastal highway as well as Zahrani province, which has the oil refinery that provides fuel Lebanon. They said Amal militiamen manning the hilltop village of Maghdousheh, which overlooks Sidon, also declared support for Hashem's uprising.

for predominantly Shiite south

The reporters said pro-Iranian Shiite factions in the south, including Hezbollah (Party of God), like the PLO, were "inactively sympathetic" to Hashem's mutiny because they share his resentment of Syria's recent dispatch of troops to Beirut's Moslem sector.

Syria sent 7,500 troops and 100 tanks into west Beirut on Feb. 21 at the request of Lebanese Moslem leaders to end a week of fierce factional fighting for control there that claimed about 300 lives.

An Amal spokesman in Beirut said the mutiny as "insignificant and bound to quickly fall apart," and claimed Hashem commands the allegiance of only 150 fighters at Marwanieh.

Arafat contends the Syrians moved in to west Beirut to rescue Amal from defeat at the hands of Druse warlord Walid Jumblatt's Progressive Socialist Party militia. Amal militia men had been carrying out sporadic attacks on Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut over the past half year in an effort to block the PLO from regaining the power base it held until the Israeli invasion in

On NBC-TV's "Meet the Press," Dole said he and other Republican leaders discussed with Reagan last Thursday what the president should say when he addresses the nation.

"Let the people know that it wasn't someone else out there who made mistakes," Dole said he counseled Reagan. The president erred in failing to respond forcefully to the initial disclosure of the clandestine arms sales program last November, Dole

The senator said Reagan should have immediately demanded that former aides John M. Poindexter and Oliver L. North cooperate at least to some extent with investigators and that Reagan should have considered calling Congress back to Washington for consultation.

The lack of such dramatic moves, Dole maintained Sunday, "has gotten the president in deeper trouble."

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., said Sunday he disagreed with Tower's position that the Iran-Contra affair was an "aberration" in terms of the administration's foreign policy-making

This is not an aberration," Nunn said an interview with television talk-show host John McLaughlin. "This is indicative" of longstanding problems involving the administration's handling of foreign policy, he

Reagan accepted Regan's resignation as chief of staff - although Regan evidently was planning to remain in his job for at least a short time longer - and persuaded former Sen. Howard H. Baker Jr. to succeed

Engstrom said if the children could get more programs like the basketball clinic, a basketball team could be assembled for the Special Olympics state competition.

Claflin said the exceptional child class dealt with learning about different types of handicaps and how schools have dealt with the children in the past. Group members will write a paper about their experiences as group leaders during the basketball clinic.

positive effect on negotiations over other (disarmament) issues," Genscher said.

Carrington said he had repeatedly asserted that it was "artificial and unreasonable" for Gorbachev to insist on a link between Star Wars and medium-range missiles.

Since NATO's decision in December 1979 to deploy 572 medium-range U.S. cruise and Pershing 2 nuclear missiles in five European nations, the Atlantic alliance repeatedly has said it would be willing to dismantle the rockets if the Soviets agreed to destroy their intermediate SS-20 missiles.

At the end of 1986, NATO said 208 Cruise missiles and 108 Pershing 2s had been deployed. NATO claims the Soviets have 441 SS-20s in place.

President insists on verification

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Reagan administration has proposed on-site inspection of Soviet medium-range missile plants to ensure observance of a treaty to eliminate such nuclear weapons from Europe, U.S. arms control director Kenneth N. Adelman said Monday.

In theory, the Soviets have agreed tougher verification measures are essential, Adelman said. But they have not agreed to any specific steps, the U.S. official said in an interview.

"They have not said no, but they have not said yes, as yet," he said.

On Saturday, Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev announced Moscow was willing to sign "without delay" a treaty with the United States to rid Europe of all Soviet and American medium-range nuclear missiles.

The Reagan administration has welcomed his offer to divorce the issue from disputes at the negotiating table in Geneva over the U.S. "Star Wars" anti-missile program and other knotty arms control problems.

In the wake of the Gorbachev announcement, negotiators for the two sides agreed to extend their talks on medium-range weapons in the Swiss city past Wednesday, when the cur-

In another sign of progress, U.S. officials here said Secretary of State George Shultz was considering a trip to Moscow to meet with Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevard-

But the officials, who demanded anonymity, said Shultz had no imminent plan to fly to the Soviet capital. "Another meeting with Shevardnadze is a reasonable proposition, a month or two from now," an official said. "But there has got to be a little preparation."

Shultz is now on a six-day trip to China. He is planning to stop in South Korea and Japan on his way home for talks with leaders of the two governments. The emphasis on verifying compliance with an accord stems from the Reagan administration's repeated accusations that the Soviets have flouted a number of arms control agreements with the United

K-State Episcopalian Chaplain Ron Clingenpeel has been training for the past eight years as a clown and has an extensive clowning repertoire including flame throwing, in which it appears flames blow from his mouth.

Priest clowns around to unmask obsessions

By DORI WITHERS Collegian Reporter

For K-State Episcopalian Chaplain Ron Clingenpeel, a normal mass may include magic tricks, juggling and even fire-

While some Episcopalian priests write books or teach, Clingenpeel has been training for the past eight years as a clown.

In addition to "clowning around" in his services, Clingenpeel performs for groups and parties and in clubs.

Through his acts, Clingenpeel said he tries to present reality in a way people can understand, so they can learn to laugh at themselves and enjoy life.

Clingenpeel said he uses juggling to show how to deal with problems in life that can add up and become overwhelming.

"Juggling is a whole story of life," he said. "You only have two hands, and there's always more in life than you can handle, so you give something away."

With this, he tosses a juggledobject, representing a problem, aside.

"The clown plays the fool for everyone and helps people see their foolishness," he said. "We can see our obsessions through the clown and may become more openminded to our problems.

He said the fool is great because he can humorously point out the issues people are obsessed or possessed with.

People are so obsessed with college, working and getting ahead, they fail to see the wonderful things offered in the world, he said.

"Everything's got to be so serious, and I understand," said Clingenpeel, "but what I fail to see sometimes is when do people seriously relax and see the beauty the world can give us?'

At this point he reaches into his props bag and pulls out a long, thin balloon, blows it up, twists it around and presents a swan. Along with juggling and creating "balloon animals," Clingenpeel sings humorous songs, tells stories, performs a mime piece and magic tricks and eats fire in his ministry.

"I wasn't one of those kids who wanted to grow up and run away to the circus," Clingenpeel said, "but I have toyed with the idea."

Part of the temptation has come from working with exceptional clowns, learning there is no limit to clowning and sharpening his skills with daily performances, he said.

Clingenpeel has performed across the nation in such states as Minnesota, New York and New Mexico and said it is the same wherever he goes: clowning touches people in their hearts.

"People having a good time; that's irreplaceable," he said as he looked through photographs of senior citizens, some in wheelchairs, enjoying his humorous depictions of life.

He said people love clowning because they can participate in the fun without being made fun of.

Clingenpeel likes making people see their foolishness by his clown-

"This is a participatory thing I do," he said. "I get the audience involved, whether it's singing a funny song or helping with a magic trick."

He said the toughest part of being a clown is rehearsing. A clown takes the risk of boring the audience if the material isn't wellrehearsed.

Clingenpeel was the producer and director of the "Minstrel Show," featuring a group of K-State students a few years ago, has led workshops and has performed solo in various clubs, parties, rest homes and conferences. He would like to perform in the Catskeller this spring if scheduling allows.

Clingenpeel has a serious side too. Next week he will travel to the University of Costa Rica in San Jose for meetings and consultations to establish an Episcopal campus ministry.

the April general election will face recent budget cuts and a tightened state economy.

Crowder, K-State Union clerk and U.S. Army retiree, said communication with Manhattan residents is vital in giving the citizens the best possible representation on the commission. The first step in ensuring that representation is getting voters to the polls, he said.

He also said he has a growing concern that commissioners have mishandled opportunities for expanding the city's industrial base.

"They (the commissioners) have been pushing for additional industries to locate here, but they have to be able to quit their nit-picking and complaining and let them in," he

"The city commission should work with the new Chamber of Commerce president to develop and attract new industries and jobs to Manhattan, but avoid overtaxing Manhattan citizens, especially those on fixed in-

Gatsche is also concerned with the Seth Childs Road improvements.

"Seth Childs Road has been in a state of emergency since people started moving to west Manhattan," he said. "The Kimball (Avenue) addition will relieve some of the pressure...but Seth Childs must be brought up to standards."

A K-State professor is among the four candidates seeking the unexpired, two-year term on the Manhattan-Ogden school board primary election today.

Fighting for the single seat on the USD 383 board, held by the late Don Hill, will be Rudy Clarenburg, Beverly Eversmeyer, Allen Nesbitt and Gary Turner.

A run-off election is required by state law when there are more than twice as many candidates as there are positions open. The two chosen today will advance to the April general election, along with the candidates for the four full school board terms.

The incumbent, Clarenburg, professor of anatomy and physiology, was appointed to fill the position after Hill's death in the middle of his four-year term. Clarenburg has been a Manhattan resident for 21 years and is currently vice president of the school board.

Clarenburg said the toughest problem facing the school board is an influx of students and the problems resulting from the increase

"Right now we are bursting at the seams," he said. "We must make a decision to either build a new school, build annexes or make the shifts He said because the district is growing at such a rapid rate, it is being hurt because the local contribution to the district's treasury must keep up with an increasingly bigger budget.

There are three programs Clarenburg would like to see implemented while a member of the new board. The first is the School Improvement Program where parents have direct input to the school. Another goal of Clarenburg's is to see through computerization of the district in all grades. Clarenburg said the program is already in stage 2, teacher training.

A third accomplishment he would like to meet is putting more emphasis on foreign language instruction in the elementary schools.

"Education is an investment," Clarenburg said. "Can we afford not to have the best education?"

The previous policy was enforced to prevent conflict of interest. She said she will provide a "view

Gates loses Reagan's nomination

WASHINGTON - President Reagan on Monday withdrew his nomination of acting CIA Director Robert M. Gates to head the spy agency, saying confirmation hearings at this time "would not be in the interest of the CIA or of the nation.

In a statement read to reporters by his new chief of staff. Howard H. Baker Jr., Reagan said he acted at the request of Gates, whose nomination to head the agency was in jeopardy of being rejected by the Senate. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Gates had become a 'lightning rod' for discontent with the administration's handling of the Iran-Contra crisis.

Attention immediately turned to Reagan's new choice to run the CIA, and the possibility existed that the president would announce his decision in a broadcast to the nation scheduled for 9 p.m. EST Wednesday. Baker said Reagan originally intended to make the announcement Monday but "it didn't quite come together that way.

Former Sen. John G. Tower, R-Texas, who headed the threemember panel that investigated the Iran-Contra affair, was offered the CIA post but turned it down, according to unnamed sources cited in today's editions of The Washington Post.

Failure led aide to suicide attempt

NEW YORK - Former national security adviser Robert McFarlane in an interview published Monday said he attempted suicide because of a sense of failure. McFarlane also told The New York Times he often felt President Reagan didn't absorb what he told him about foreign affairs.

McFarlane, who took an overdose of Valium in Feb. 9, was interviewed at his home in Bethesda, Md., a suburb of Washington. The Times did not say when the interview took place, but McFarlane returned home last week after being hospitalized for clinical depression

"What really drove me to despair was a sense of having failed the country," McFarlane said. "If I had stayed at the White House, I'm sure I could have stopped things from getting worse.

McFarlane, Reagan's national security adviser until December 1985, directed the first on-and-off U.S. efforts to make contact with Iran, and in May 1986 returned without pay to head a secret mission to Tehran aimed at freeing hostages.

McFarlane said he resigned because he felt he would never achieve enough stature to influence Reagan on international events.

Court convicts 18 in narcotic ring

NEW YORK - Eighteen men, including the reputed former boss of the Sicilian Mafia, were convicted Monday in a $1.6 billion international narcotics conspiracy in a case dubbed the "Pizza Connection." A 19th defendant was acquitted of all charges after a 17-month federal trial that began Sept. 30, 1985. "It's been a great day," U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani said after the verdicts. "I was worried... We'd invested a great deal of time into this case.' One defendant was killed last year, and a second was shot and seriously wounded last month as he walked on a Greenwich Village street. Two of the original 22 defendants pleaded guilty to lesser charges after the trial began. Prosecutors alleged the defendants were part of an international drug importing and money-laundering conspiracy controlled by the

Sicilian Mafia and a faction of its American counterpart, La Cosa The defendants used pizzerias in the Northeast and Midwest as fronts for the distribution of $1.6 billion in heroin imported into the United States over a decade, prosecutors said.

Department levies toxic waste fines

TOPEKA - The Department of Health and Environment levied fines totaling $9,000 against two companies and a private individual Monday for their handling of waste in three unrelated incidents.

Lt. Gov. Jack Walker, temporary secretary of the agency, announced he had slapped an $8,000 fine against R.O. Corp. of Olathe for violating hazardous waste storage regulations.

R.O. Corp., a manufacturing firm, was cited for not labeling and storing hazardous wastes after health officials inspected the facility on Dec. 11.

Bob Moody, health agency spokesman, said the company also was fined for its failure to provide documentation of ongoing personnel training and weekly inspections of its hazardous waste storage area.

Moody said the company was unable to provide signed copies of manifests needed to prove 12 shipments of hazardous waste were accepted by a licensed waste dump. The company has 15 days to appeal its fine.

A.A. Mactal Construction Co., of Blue Springs, Mo., was fined $500 for violating state asbestos removal regulations.

Mactal Construction was contracted to remove asbestos from the Derby Food Center on the Kansas State University campus in December and January. Moody said a bearded employee of the company was seen in the work area without the proper type of full-face respirator, required of workers with facial hair.

Moody said Mactal has 15 days to appeal the fine.

Low radon levels found in homes

WICHITA - Few of 50 Sedgwick County homes randomly tested for the radioactive gas radon were contaminated, according to a study by the Wichita-Sedgwick County Health Department.

'We really didn't find anything outrageously high," said Jack Brown, the department's chief of environmental services. Radon is a colorless, odorless gas that is a leading cause of lung cancer. It seeps into houses as uranium and radium decay in soil. The Environmental Protection Agency planned to test for radon in 10 states, including Kansas, this winter. Earlier tests found high levels of radon in some homes in eastern Kansas.

Treadmill measures horses' athletic abilities

By RITA GRAVES Collegian Reporter

As coaches train athletes to peak at a certain time for competition, trainers of athletic horses are also looking for the horse to "peak out."

To gain the ability to know when a horse is ready for competition, better

Researchers in the College of Veterinary Medicine have gained this knowledge through developing a research program in sports medicine.

knowledge of the horse's condition is $25,000 high-speed treadmill developed in Sweden. The treadmill is one of four in the United States and the only one in the Midwest.

'The department has excellent facilities for equine sports medicine and exercise physiology," said Howard Erickson, professor of physiology.

The treadmill is used to evaluate horses are conditioned less than Arabian, quarter horses, thoroughbreds and other breeds.

"Horses are different from humans in that they are far more natural athletes; they were made for running whereas humans were not,' said Marion Fedde, professor of anatomy and physiology. "Athletic humans to prevent injury."

In addition, horses do not de-train as rapidly as humans, giving them the ability to stay in shape longer than humans, he said.

Erickson said the treadmill can be used to evaluate pulmonary functions for clinical testing and comparison of horses. It can also be used in the study of exercise-induced pulmonary hemorrhage.

"A lot of horses often bleed after a race, so we use this test to determine the cause and to measure the blood pressure," Erickson said.

Another test used in measuring the index of performance is to check heartbeat, stride length and frequency. This test is also measured on a track located near the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

"The major goal of sports medicine in horses is to increase performance, and reduce injury and disease," Erickson said.

Recently, K-State researchers utilized their treadmill facilities to assess the condition of one of the top endurance racing horses in the United States.

'At the request of Equus magazine, (horse-racing magazine) we evaluated three Arabian horses to determine why this (breed of) horse was so brilliant," Erickson said.

By conducting these tests, researchers discovered that the tissues of this breed had a higher oxygen intake, Gillespie said.

"Evaluating the champion horse helped the research team undersnot equally well-adapted to exercise," Gillespie said. He said researchers have learned some body systems in the champion horse have evolved further than in other horses.

Gail Landgren, graduate student in veterinary medicine, said some of these evaluations have already been applied to race horses. She is currently working on a research project dealing with ventilation in horses, evaluating the amount of oxygen in-

"The reason I came to K-State is because there were better research possibilities with the addition of the treadmill," Landgren said.

Because of the clinical testing potential of the treadmill, K-State is attracting some clients who want to determine the athletic ability and physical condition of their horses, Erickson said.

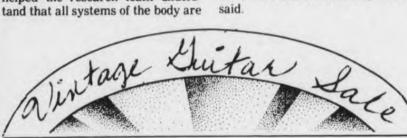

"Our facilities can help us determine the difference between the best horses and the weaker ones," he

Research involving athletic horses requires a lot of money, and the equipment is expensive.

'It's not cheap research," Erickson said.

The sports medicine research is being funded by the Grayson Foundation and the U.S. Department of Agriculture. In addition, the research has recently received funding from the American Horse Shows Association.

"For the amount of money that goes into horse racing, it's a shame more isn't known about it," Fedde

Musical patterns mirror culture, ideals

What has happened to music in the last decade and a half? I was listening to some old Beatles tunes the other day and I thought to myself, "Ah, now there's the real rock 'n' roll." I then contemplated the current screech that dominates today's airwaves and thought, "What in God's name has happened to people's taste in music?!'

Like anything in life, music has changed over the years. However, when was it that music — a form of expression and an outlet for creativity and unleashed imagination took a turn for the worse?

In the 1960s, a serious contemplation of life took place. The youth of America questioned life in the United States and the answers they found were not good. The death of a young, idealistic president in 1963 shattered the hopes of many Americans, but that was just the start. The Vietnam war descended upon us in the 1960s. America was not only forced to take a good hard look at the brutality of the war, but it was forced to question the totality of the government's method of operating.

The music of the 1960s expressed the concern and outrage many Americans felt at the time. The previous decade had been plagued by police-state McCarthyism and complacency which in no way gave a good beginning to what would soon become the revolutionary '60s. But the musical artists of the '60s were able to reflect the issues of the day in a poetic and profound way, no matter how complex and distressing life seemed.

The words of these great artists - The Beatles, Bob Dylan, Janis Joplin, Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young, The Doors and others became gospel for the youth of America. They applied their philosophies, expressions of freedom and quests for individual fulfillment to their lives.

Drugs increasingly became, for many young people, the path to an insight into the revolutionary life of the '60s. Music, as well as other media, reflected this altered sense of being. Books such as Tom Wolfe's "Electric Kool-Aide Acid Test," songs such as "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds," and the popularity of the underground press advocated drugs and other ways to reach a "higher consciousness." These media became buffers and outlets for what otherwise could have been a much more destructive and dangerous decade.

PATTI PAXSON Collegian

Columnist

We all grew older in the 1970s, but not necessarily wiser. With the end of the Vietnam war and the subsequent abolition of the draft, American youth were left burned out and without a cause. They became uninspired and vegetative, quickly putting behind the intensity of the 1960s. Their music reflected this state of being with the advent of "disco." This music was superficial, repetitive and mindless zombie music. We no longer thought about the words, but instead danced unquestioningly to a plastic, predesigned and polyester beat.

The 1970s had its share of national scandals, but did we care? No, we truly did not. Watergate and its byproducts brought about definite concerns, but honestly, how long could anyone watch those long, drawn-out Watergate proceedings on television? We cared long enough to force President Richard Nixon and his partners in crime to relinquish their governmental positions, but that was about the extent of American concerns during the 1970s.

Punk rock, new wave and heavy metal music have since replaced a good portion of that expressive, poetic and meaningful rock 'n' roll of the 1960s and the rock music that survived through the 1970s. In one way, I feel this music expresses the general American attitude of the 1980s, but on the other hand I know it can't possibly. Screeching purplehaired gyrating maniacs carrying on about dead babies, rock lobsters and the like cannot possibly have any significance in this life.

On the flip side, though, this meaningless aural abuse might be a sign of the times. Could it be we've become so hardened and jaded that groups like Ratt, Twisted Sister and The Dead Kennedys are actually representative of America's culture and present attitude toward its people and government? What a frightening thought.

Since its inception, rock 'n' roll music has always been quite an accurate measure of what the people who follow it are concerned about. There's been a recent return to some of the old philosophies of the 1960s and 1970s in American music. Artists such as Bruce Springsteen express a down-to-earth philosophy of life, but never quite achieve the profoundness of the '60s.

The oldsters are still around producing hit after hit. The Rolling Stones and Paul Simon, for example, still manage to keep making music that is not only well-liked, but has substance and meaning as well. Once in a while, some of the reliable oldsters stray off the trail of meaningfulness and onto the trail of commercialism, but that is a sign of the

It will be interesting to see what the 1990s will bring. I think music will continue to reflect signs of the times. It will probably be very computerized and electronic, making today's technology look primitive. And without a doubt, the meaning of the music will be so deep that only a computer chip would understand it. Perish the thought and pass the Janis Joplin records.

link was made between the Iran-Contra aid scam and the South African government. The South African government has been working with the United States for more than four years to provide military aid to Contra rebels in Central America. It was also disclosed that former CIA Director William Casey was in charge of the operation.

Apparently, a South African cargo company - South Air Freighters - was leasing out planes to fly weapons to the Contras. In addition, ABC News reported that high-level policy meetings had been held in South Africa and Washington to discuss South African aid to the rebels in Nicaragua.

The implications of this development are many. The with a country that is the scorn of and many U.S. corporations ing.

A true ally

I'm getting tired of picking up the Collegian only to be fed a steady diet of blatant anti-Israeli sentiment. The latest comes in an unsigned editorial of Feb. 17. The writer states that a "passionate and destructive attachment has grown between the United States and Israel." That's rather strong, abusive language to use toward one of America's few (if not only) true allies in the Middle East. Furthermore, in quoting the estimated amount of money the American economy apparently "suffers" per year in aid to Israel, we readers are basically led to believe that the United States' financial status doesn't "suffer" at all in giving aid to beaucoup other countries. Another complaint of the editorial was a $250 million military development grant which could jeopardize some American jobs. I thought this country was founded on democratic principles where competition is the "American way."

I suggest that those who pieced together the editorial begin to spend their time more wisely pointing out such heinous atrocities as terrorism and human rights indecencies that pose a real threat to our future security. Why does the United States continue to support

Israel? Because we are not isolated from the rest of the world and can't exist as such. We support Israel for our own interests as much as Israel's. Fortunately, that interest is a common one. It's called peace - something which isn't obtained easily or for free. would hope that the Collegian staff would choose to help realize this dream for peace. Jacki Gordon graduate in biology

Poor fan behavior

Editor,

I attended the men's basketball game against Missouri Tuesday night and I have two things to say about the game: One, even though we lost, I'm proud of our team members. They tried.

Two, I'm really disappointed in our fans. They didn't try. Yes, they made lots of noise, but only when things were going well for us. When circumstances weren't in our favor, many fans threw tantrums and pouted like 2-year-olds. Come on, people. Act your age. It's OK to have fun, but basketball is just a

The main reason I'm writing is because of an incident many people probably did not notice. In the last few seconds, one of the peabrains in the first row of general seating threw one of those miniature basketballs across the court and hit a coach. Our coach. This was no accident. This was deliberate.

All right, you imbecile, how do you expect the coaches to do their jobs when things like this happen? They're there to coach, not dodge flying projectiles. Maybe you threw the ball at them because you thought they weren't doing a very good job.

If so, then think about this: Last year at this time we were pretty near, if not in, the cellar of the Big Eight. Now we're not. Maybe the coaches don't do everything right, but they must be doing something right. If you can't act better than you did then stay

The K-State Libraries appreciate the comments made by Patti Paxson in the Feb. 17 Collegian. We would like to respond by providing some additional information.

In response to the comments about the age of the collections, as recently as 1961 the collections totaled only 300,000 volumes. In other words, 70 percent of the collections have been acquired in the last 25 years. More than 50 percent of these additions consist of materials in the humanities and social sciences, thus responding to the broadening of the University's general mission as a comprehensive instructional and research institution.

One of the major methods of material acquisition is the approval plans tailored to K-State instruction and research programs. In theory, every book published in the English language and relating to K-State's programs is received. This should indicate no shortage of new materials. In addition to the automatic approval plans, librarians, faculty and students may recommend titles to be ordered. The reference to missing pages or journal issues is a continuing problem. By mutilating or stealing materials, students are cheating themselves and mortgaging the future. Stolen items simply will not be here for the next generation. Theft and mutilation of books, periodicals, films or other library property are crimes under Kansas law (21 K.S.A. 3701, 3720). Periodicals continue to increase in price and have a much higher inflation rate than the average increase in living.

Do students know that an annual periodical subscription rate now averages $136? That the average cost of a science book is $100? By assuming a more protective view of the library, both books and money could be saved. Money spent for replacement of journals could be better applied to new books.

Often the student approach to research is superficial. For instance, the students use Infotrac exclusively for a subject search and the end result is that numerous individuals are looking for the same journal titles. Reference librarians would happily suggest alternative indexes and resources

As for the physical facilities, there has been only a Band-Aid approach to the problems of heat, air-conditioning and generally needed environmental improvements. Within our budget constraints, we have planned for better lighting, cleanliness and fresh

'Elm Street' part three frightfully pleasureable

By GARY JOHNSON Collegian Reviewer

Sequels to horror movies are usually about as dreary as movies get. Look no further than "A Nightmare on Elm Street 2" for proof of that.

Film Review

But with the newest episode in this series, "A Nightmare on Elm Street 3: Dream Warriors," director Chuck Russell and writer Wes Craven (the director of "Elm Street 1") have created a genuinely frightening trip into the world of dreams.

Instead of simply retreading the material from the first two movies, the filmmakers have come up with some interesting new twists. For instance, the kids in this movie aren't simply passive victims waiting to be drawn and quartered. Several of these kids envision themselves with special powers in their dreams.

One boy (who actually is lame but walks in his dreams) sees himself as a dungeon master - complete with the powers of a wizard. One girl sees herself as an expert tumbler and another girl sees herself as a knife wielding punk rocker. These visions of themselves come in handy when Freddy Krueger invades their dreams and starts slashing away with his razor sharp talons.

Also to the movie's benefit, the filmmakers give us some characters we can really care about. One of the big weaknesses of "Elm Street 2"

HAIR CLINIC

WELCOMES YOU!!!

HIS & HERS

HandiCorner 1106 Laramie Aggieville

was the characters were all genuinely dull - empty-minded teen-agers just waiting to get sliced and diced. But in "Elm Street 3," the teen-agers are an energetic bunch who must pull together to fight off Freddy.

As the movie starts, these teenagers are in a mental hospital where the doctors keep telling them helpful things like "You must face your dreams." But the kids know better than this. Whenever they fall asleep, they're in immediate danger of losing their lives.

One of the doctors (Craig Wasson) starts to believe their dreams about Freddy are more than mass hysteria, thanks to the advice of a med student (Heather Langenkamp from "Elm Street 1")

Not surprisingly, the best scenes in the movie come when the kids drift asleep and find themselves within their nightmares.

As in most horror movies, one of the biggest weaknesses is the acting. Langenkamp belongs to the headshaking school of acting. We're supposed to believe she's an intelligent med student, but she acts more like a mannequin.

Another weakness is the all too familiar situations. For instance, the doctors become the bad guys - too stupid to understand what's happening. If it weren't for the imaginative nightmare sequences, the cliche situations might have overwhelmed the movie, but the surrealistic trips into the dreamworld are so suspenseful they make up for the movie's weaknesses.

Students flock south for spring break

By ERIN MULCAHY Collegian Reporter

Bathing suits, a pair of shades, tropical suntan oil, Frisbees and plenty of fun await students heading south to the popular spots of Padre Island, Texas, and Fort Lauderdale,

Students around the country will flock to the sunny cities of Padre and Fort Lauderdale from March 2 through April 17. For those six of entertainment.

The intercollegiate competitions in Fort Lauderdale are created by a Spring Season Task Force. The events run from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Monday through Friday, on the beaches of Fort Lauderdale, across from the Bahia Mar Yachting

The college games are sponsored by the city of Fort Lauderdale, Budweiser and Y-100 (100.7 FM) radio station. The radio station will broadcast highlights of the events throughout the day.

The city of Fort Lauderdale also sponsors special events throughout the six weeks of spring break

K-Staters vacationing in Fort Lauderdale can partake in the St. Patrick's Day celebration March 17. The celebration begins with a big parade along Las Olas Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale, and other Irish festivities will continue throughout the afternoon. Also, Yankee fans can enjoy a glimpse of spring training with the New York Yankees at the Fort Lauderdale Stadium.

A Fort Lauderdale New River Street Dance will be held March 20-21. The late afternoon event will feature live entertainment, outdoor dancing and fireworks

The Fort Lauderdale tourism and business community has designed the spring break games and special events in accordance to three Spring Season Task Forces

The three-pronged program consists of the organized games on the beach, a code of student behavior and ethics pedestrian walkway along Fort Lauderdale's A1A highway.

The code of ethics is available at hotels, clubs and the Tourist Development Council. Details of the local laws and ordinances of Fort Lauderdale are covered in the code. One of the points in the code that affects many students is the drinking age now being 21 in Florida.

Flying necessitates prudent planning they don't pay much attention to it."

Students planning to travel over vacation or run the risk of turning a good time into a bad experience.

One area to which students need to pay special attention is air travel. Once flight reservations have been made, the first thing to do is make sure the dates on the tickets are correct, said Bob Pearson, manager of Kansas State Travel, 1228 Westloop.

Pearson said the second thing to do is flip through the airline ticket and make sure there is a coupon for each

"Because we humans are involved in this, a ticket or coupon that is needed (might) be pulled out by mistake," he said.

"The person that pulls an extra coupon can travel on that and you are out that money," said Judy Samuelson, owner of International Tours of Manhattan, Eighth and Humbolt streets.

The passenger should check the ticket after each time another person handles it.

"My philosophy is any time anybody handles my ticket, I always check to make sure everything is there when I get it back, just to stay away from those kind of problems,' Pearson said.

Another warning for travelers is be sure the tickets are kept in a safe place, because they do have value.

"Most people think that this thing (a ticket) is just a piece of paper, and if you can't locate it, it can be replaced," Pearson said. "That's not true. That baby is cash."

Referring to a round-trip ticket from Denver to San Diego, he said, "A person should look at it as $198 instead of just a piece of paper.'

"Your airline ticket is a negotiable instrument," Samuelson said. "Most people either don't realize that or

Outside of taking care of tickets, she said travelers should take good care of their luggage. When luggage spring break must prepare for their attendants check baggage in, a passenger should watch what is written on the luggage tag and even cross-check it with the airline ticket to make sure the luggage is going to the correct destination.

It is wise to never walk away from luggage in the airport. When it is checked in outside the doors to the airport, Samuelson said she asks the person who checked in the luggage to take it directly to the conveyor belt. She then watches to make sure the luggage is on the belt before she gets ready to board the plane.

With international travel, it is especially important to make sure the luggage gets to the proper destination. Samuelson suggests that anyone going from Kansas City to New York and on to Europe should hand carry his or her luggage from one terminal to the next any time a switch has been made in planes.

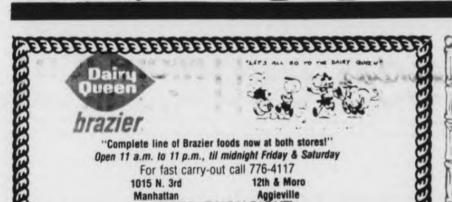

If a bag is lost, the first thing to do is to go to the airline and file a lost baggage form, Pearson said. The minute it is filed, the airline begins tracing the bag.

He said 95 percent of the bags lost are returned within one day after filing. Five percent are lost due to various other reasons, including

If luggage is lost, each airline has a policy it adheres to in the process of reimbursement, Pearson said. On the back of individual tickets is the airline's policy, which normally covers $500-$800 worth of merchandise, he said.

Pearson also said airlines usually ask to be given at least 24 hours to locate a lost bag. If it cannot be located within one day, the airline will furnish toiletry items, but it

Ski trips popular for student breaks

By JACKIE SHOCKEY Collegian Reporter

The chairlift rises slowly to the top of the mountain. Getting off the lift, a skier moves to the slope and gets ready to ski or fall downhill, whichever the case may be.

After spending the last few weeks cramming for mid-terms, many students take advantage of spring break and head for the slopes. With a little advance preparation and planning, a ski trip can be just what a student needs in a vacation.

A typical problem with many new and old skiers alike is what equipment to take on the ski trip. One basic thing you need is a good pair of

"Snow can be very abrasive. It's very important to get a good pair of gloves to protect your hands," said John Hurd, salesman at The Pathfinder, 1111 Moro St

"Always wear a layering system, there can be a 30-degree difference between top of the slope and the bottom. This can be very intense on your body," he said.

Hurd also advised skiers to wear thin layers of clothing with the outer layer being waterproof. He said to use a light to medium sock with elastic on both the top and bottom instead of a thick sock.

"Many people try to ski in blue jeans, forgetting that they will get wet and it will be difficult to ski in them," Hurd said.

Lastly, Hurd advised all potential skiers to drink plenty of water because lack of liquid is one of the most common reasons skiers feel drained at the end of the day. Forgetting to pack necessary items can be a definite problem on cost around $260, Dailey said any trip. Certain items always seem to be included in everyone's list of forgotten things and have to be bought once the trip has started.

"You don't usually forget the basics such as your ski equipment, it's usually something you've been planning on taking and just forget," said Eric Snell, junior in journalism and mass communications. Items such as ski pants, sunglasses, sunscreen and lip balm are some items people typically forget, he

"It really makes you upset when you forget something because you're on a limited budget and then you end up having to spend your money replacing an item," Snell said.

If flying to a skiing destination, travelers should remember the limit on baggage allowed on the plane, said Nancy Dailey, travel agent for Kansas State Travel, 1228 Westloop.

"You're allowed to check two bags in and you can carry one bag onto the plane," she said. "You can use your ski boots as your carry-on bag if you want and your skis can be counted as one of your check-on bags. Anything after this, you'll be charged for."

Dailey said late-planners may want to drive rather than book a flight this late. In addition, she advised anyone that hasn't booked a room to try a small hotel rather than the larger ones which fill up first.

"To be honest almost everything's booked at this point, specifically the 14th and the 22nd," Dailey said.

The main thing is to plan early, and not wait until after Christmas when the rates go up. For example before Christmas a student booking a flight to Vail, Colo., would have paid around $170 round-trip, now it would Red Tide still exists form a soupy-like condition in the By TOM DENZEL believe. A bacteria called Red Tide has been reported on the beaches of South Padre Island and confirmed by the Corpus Christi Public Health Department. First sighting of this bacteria was early in August 1986 in the Galveston, Texas, area. It slowly worked its way down the shore line and appeared on the beaches of Padre in November, but has since disappeared.

"Red Tide is most common on the west coast of Florida," said Richard Pierce, associate director of Mote Marine Laboratories in Sarasoda, Fla. "There has not been an outbreak of this proportion in 10 years."

This bacteria substance acquired its name from cell-like particles that gather in large concentrations and water, giving it a red tinge. The cell particles can become entrapped in the gills of fish, causing the them to suffocate.

Red Tide is believed to come from the floor of the Gulf of Mexico, and it surfaces or blooms around early fall and summer.

"Theory has it that Red Tide surfaces when the weather is warm and the sun is shining, but that is not always the case," Pierce said.

Journalism students face mandatory language skills testing

By SANDRA M. SIEBERT Collegian Reporter

Before enrolling in two journalism writing classes next semester, students will have to take a test to determine if their language skills are sufficient to complete the course.

"We are spending far too much time in the beginning writing class on grammar - language skills types of things," said Carol Oukrop, head of the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications.

Currently, the prerequisite for these two courses, Reporting 1 and Writing for the Electronic Media, is a "C" or better in Composition 1 and 2.

Many of these students, however, are entering the beginning journalism writing classes with deficient language skills, said Paul Parsons, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

This semester the Reporting 1, Writing for Electronic Media and Editing 1 students were given the Reporting 1 students did not make a score of 75 or better. Seventy-five percent is being considered as the cut-off point for passing or failing, Parsons said

'We're wanting to screen out those students who obviously don't have good language skills," Parsons said. 'We feel like we have a very basic test here. If a person can't make a 75 or better, then it truly means they do not have sufficient language skills for a career in mass communica-

Next semester a student will be able to get into the beginning journalism writing classes by passing Composition 1 and 2 or by passing the basic language skills test or by getting a 26 or better on the verbal part of the ACT test. Once the new course catalog is distributed in August 1988, a student will be required to pass the language skills test or get a score of 26 on the ACT before entering the beginning writing classes.

new catalog is printed before requiring students to pass the language skills test.

The score of 26 on the ACT was chosen when a correlation between the ACT scores and Reporting 1 grades was found. An overwhelming majority of students who had a 26 on the ACT verbal skills section received an "A" or "B" in Reporting 1, and none received less than a "C.

The department's Subcommittee on Language Skills decided this correlation demonstrated that students receiving a score of 26 or better would do well in Reporting 1, Parsons said.

In addition, any student who passes the test will be able to get into Reporting 1 before taking the current requirement of Composition 1 and 2. This would allow students into the journalism curriculum earlier.

Reporting 2 students must work on the newspaper to fulfill class requirements.

By passing the test, students will be able to get into the beginning journalism writing classes their first semester, instead of waiting until they have completed Composition 1 and 2.

"We would like to see the really good freshmen, who come to K-State excited about getting into journalism and mass communications, get into Reporting 1 earlier. That way they're in the position to be leaders at KSDB, on the Collegian, in other student publications and in our student organizations," Parsons said.

This would also put these students in better positions to get internships, around the country, Parsons said. The test from the University of Texas' communications program was found to be the most appropriate for K-State's needs. Sixty percent of the K-State test is derived from the University of Texas test, Parsons

Students who do not pass the language skills test will be referred to a writing lab in the Department of English. In the writing lab, there is almost a one-to-one relationship between students and instructors, and students are able to receive intensive instruction in language and writing

Students can take the test the semester before they plan to take 12, Parsons said.

KU's physical play sidelines K-State title bid

By DARAN NEUSCHAFER Sports Writer

SALINA - The championship game of the Big Eight Conference women's postseson tournament was decided in the opening five KU scored the game's first 14 points and then coasted to an 85-51 romp against K-State to capture another Big Eight title and earn a trip to the NCAA tournament. Kansas, Missouri and K-State tied for the regularseason crown.

"If the first five minutes weren't kamikaze basketball, I don't know what is," said Mossman, referring to the Lady Jayhawks' defensive tactics. "I'm a little disappointed in the way Susan Green was treated in those first five minutes.

Kansas' main objective was to take K-State's point guard out of the game early. And the plan worked, as Green got frustrated by the physical play and struggled along with the entire Lady Cat team the rest of the half.

"There was no doubt in my mind that we had to contain Green," KU coach Marian Washington said. "We tried to take Green out of the game. We felt she was a major key."

KU's senior guard Evette Ott drew the assignment of defending Green, but she said the Lady Jayhawks did not do anything out of the ordinary against K-State.

"I just went out and played defense the best way I know how," Ott said.

Carlisa Thomas finally got things going for the Lady Cats when she canned an offbalance jump shot at the 15:14 mark of the first half. Thomas, who was named the tournament's Most Valuable Player, scored nine of K-State's 23 points in the first half.

Besides shutting down the Lady Cat offense, one which had been explosive in its other two tournament games, KU also got things rolling early on with its offense. The Lady Jayhawks hit their first four shots of the game and ended up shooting 54 percent from the field for the game.

"We just played a good, solid game from baseline to baseline tonight. I'm very happy with our play," Washington said.

K-State did attempt to hang tough in the first half, cutting the Kansas lead to 13 points three times. But KU scored the final five points of the half and led 41-23 at the intermission. "We told the girls that we could still do it just as long as we took it one basket at a time," said Mossman of her talk at halftime.

And K-State did make a little move on Kansas in the opening moments of the second half. The Lady Cats cut the lead to 45-31 with 16:03 remaining, but Big Eight Newcomer of the Year Lisa Braddy scored six straight points for KU and vanquished K-State's last hope. 'In the second half, when we got it cut to 14. I thought that if we could get it under 12 we would have a chance," Mossman said. "But give Kansas credit, they always got the shot to fall when they needed it to. K-State was led by Green with 16 points. Thomas added 11 points, 15 rebounds, and seven assists, before she left the game with 9:15 left after severely spraining an ankle. KU controlled the inside game behind a 23-point output by Jackie Martin. Martin also pulled down 13 rebounds and held K-State's leading scorer, Sue Leiding, to just five Braddy, Lisa Dougherty, and Lisa Baker each threw in 12 points and Ott added 10. Martin and Ott were named to the All-Tournament team along with K-State's Thomas, Missouri's Renee Kelly, and Maurtice Ivy of Nebraska.

The loss puts a damper on K-State's 22-8 season, but Mossman said she is still hoping for an at-large bid to the NCAA tourney when invitations are made Sunday.

"I'll be disappointed if we don't get an NCAA bid," Mossman said.

Lady Cat center Sue Leiding consoles Susan Green near the end of the Big Eight Conference postseason tournament championship game as Stephanie Lane watches the final seconds tick off the clock Friday at the Bicentennial Center in Salina. The University of Kansas defeated the Lady Cats 85-51 to claim the Big Eight title.

K-State rodeo squad falters at Dodge City

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's rodeo team had a dismal weekend at Dodge City Community College, said Coach Neal Woollen.

The weather wasn't a factor because the rodeo was held indoors. But Woollen said K-State received some tough draws and only three people placed in firstround events during the three-day

Vern Gardener placed third in the first round of the bareback riding competition but didn't place in the top four in overall results. Team points are only awarded to the top four finishers in each category.

In women's barrel racing, Tracy Thurow took third in the first round but was disqualified in the second round when her horse struck a barrel.

K-State has the weekend off and will see its next competition March 20-22 at Fort Scott Community College. The rodeo team will host a free pork barbecue and fund-raising white elephant auction at 8 p.m. Wednesday at the Ranch Saloon.

Royals' ownership case brought to trial

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - A California man who tried to buy an interest in the Kansas City Royals had a his dream of major league baseball ownership thwarted by Royals owners Ewing Kauffman and Avron Fogelman, his attorney said Monday at the start of trial of a lawsuit filed over the affair.

But the lawyer for Kauffman and Fogelman said Michael Shapiro misrepresented himself and his finances and that his proposal was an inadequately financed scheme involving a silent partner.

Shapiro, of Los Angeles, alleged breach of contract and is seeking $50 million in damages. Defendants are Kauffman, Fogelman, the Royals and Marion Laboratories, the drug manufacturing company founded by Kauffman.

A jury of three men and three women is hearing the case before Judge Scott Wright, who said it is expected to last at least through next week.

Kauffman, who became a millionaire after founding Marion Laboratories in his garage after World War II, brought major league baseball back to Kansas City by forming the Royals as an expansion club in 1968.

Fogelman, a real estate investor and developer from Memphis, bought a 49 percent interest in 1983 for $10 million, plus a $1 million option. The agreement calls for him to gain full control by 1991 for another $12 million, including the option

Shapiro's lawsuit, filed at Los Angeles in 1985 and later transferred to Kansas City, contends he was wrongfully deprived of the opportunity to buy into the ball club. In addition to breach of contract, it accuses the defendants of fraud, civil conspiracy and securities fraud.

The lawsuit says Kauffman and Shapiro reached an agreement in January of 1983 under which Shapiro says he paid $100,000 for an option to buy the 49 percent interest for $10 million. For another $1 million, Shapiro was to receive another option to buy the rest of the club by October 1987 for a total price of $20 million for cable television rights to Royals games.

In addition, Shapiro was to pay $10

Steve Kramer, Shapiro's attorney, said he will show that his client's $100,000 has never been returned and that Kauffman and Fogelman "succumbed to human temptation" and felt they were so important as to be above the law.

Kramer said that as the formal contract was being drawn up, Kauffman had it changed to restrict his right to assign a portion of the agreement to a third party and requiring him to show he had a net worth of $23 million, rather than the $500,000 called for in an earlier letter of agree-

"They knew that by putting that into the agreement it made it impossible for Mr. Shapiro to sign it."

Salina did a great job in hosting the Big Eight tournament

SALINA - Let's all give Salina a big hand for the great job it did hosting the Women's Big Eight Conference postseason basketball tournament this past weekend.

"I'm real happy with the situation and I think the people of Salina deserve a lot of credit for getting people in the stands," said K-State coach Matilda Mossman.

The largest crowd to ever see a Big Eight women's tournament game turned out Monday night in full force for the championship contest between K-State and Kansas. Fans started filling the bleachers for the crowd, there were still people in the championship game before 5:30 p.m. - a half hour before either team arrived for the 7 p.m. matchup.

Salina may not be anywhere the size of Kansas City, Mo., but when it comes to filling the stands for the women's Big Eight tournament, the city could teach Kansas City a thing or two. In the last three years, the finals of the tournament were held in Kemper Arena in Kansas City where crowds averaged around 500 for the championship game. "Even if it was a pro-K-State

CHASE CLARK Sports Writer

stands," Mossman said.

"Even if we would have been the team from farther away and we'd been playing in front of someone else's crowd, I'd rather play in front of 5,000 people than in front of five," she added.

Salina, in its first year of hosting the tournament, managed to get more than 4,000 people in the stands for the games in the first two rounds.

As if that didn't embarrass Kansas City enough, Salina decided to show off once more by filling the Bicentennial Center with 6,144 very loud people for the championship match.

And what a crowd it was. They started cheering when the Lady Jawhawks came out onto the floor, continued yelling when the Lady Cats came out, and screamed throughout the introductions and on into the game.

The fans of both teams erupted when their team scored. They loudly booed at what they thought were poor calls made by the officials.

As much as I would like to comment about Big Eight officials, especially the ones for the women's game, I won't - basically for fear of a lawsuit

Oh, what the heck, let's regress for a second. The officials once again did a terrible job, terrible even for Big Eight officials. And we all know how bad Big Eight officiating really is.

As the Missouri crowd puts it: "Big Eight refs. What a Joke."

Well, enough old news. Let's get back to the subject at hand - congratulating Salina.

The people of Salina did a great job in every aspect; from organizing and preparing the tournament to drawing a terrific crowd and keeping them here until the end. If this year was any indication of what future tournaments would be like, I sincerely hope Salina keeps hosting the tournament. I don't think any other city could have done as

Bill could limit public smoking areas

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - Supporters of a bill that would prohibit smoking in all public places in Kansas except certain smoking areas told a House committee Monday Kansans deserve a smoke-free environment, but opponents said the bill would not provide one.

"It's time the state of Kansas goes on record and provides a smoke-free area in all public places," Jerry Slaughter, lobbyist for the Kansas Medical Society, told the House Public Welfare and Health Comittee.

Dave Pomeroy, president of Kansans for Nonsmoking Rights, said last year's report by the U.S. Surgeon General proved secondhand smoke was harmful to nonsmokers.

"I, or one of my family members or one of your family members could become seriously ill because of exposure to tobacco smoke," Pomeroy said.

The House bill would prohibit smoking in all public places but would allow business proprietors to set aside smoking areas in public places except for health-care institutions and public transportation. However, the bill does not say what percentage of public areas must be kept smoke-free.

Slaughter, whose group suggested the proposal, said individual proprietors should decide how much space to set aside for smokers based on the size of their establishments.

But Roberta Kunkle, consultant with the American Lung Association of Kansas, said, "If a specific percentage is not in the bill, a proprietor could allow only one table in a large restaurant. That does not reflect the number of nonsmokers in our society."

Nationwide, about 31 percent of the population smokes, but only 22 percent of Kansans smoke, Kunkle

Bill Mitchell, lobbyist for the Tobacco Institute, spoke against the bill, saying it would take away individuals' rights and could not be enforced. The bill carries a $20 penalty fee.

"Can you imagine telling a doctor he can't smoke in his own private office where no one else goes?" Mitchell said. A doctor's office is considered a health-care institu-

Mitchell also said many Kansas towns, such as Topeka and Lawrence, and companies, such as Boeing, have started regulating smoking.

"You'd better let the local people solve their own problems," he said. "I don't think the state can solve this problem.'

Bill proposes changing community college aid

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA - A lobbyist and a state Board of Education member asked lawmakers Monday to eliminate some restrictions on how much aid community colleges can receive from counties and the state.

Merle Hill, director of the Kansas Association of Community Colleges, and Connie Hubbell, a member of the education board, urged the House Education Committee to endorse a bill that would change the formula for giving community colleges state and county aid.

However, Beverly Bradley, a lobbyist for the Kansas Association of Counties, said the bill would cost counties too much.

Currently, the state's 19 community colleges receive $23 from the state for each credit hour enrolled in by students who live outside a college's district. Counties in which out-ofdistrict students live as permanent résidents must also pay $23 for each credit hour.

However, the state limits such aid to 64 credit hours for most student and 72 hours for students in nursing would increase state aid to community colleges by $473,000 in the next fiscal year, which begins July 1. "It is our understanding that Kansas is the only state that places limitations in the computation of credit hours," Hubbell said. Hill said the bill, if enacted, would help community colleges better deal with older students and students who take additional classes to learn new job skills.

"It appears to fly in the face of the thrust toward economic development enhancement," Hill said of the limit on aid.

However, Bradley said the bill, which also would increase counties' payments to community colleges by $473,000, would put too much of a burden on counties and their tax-

Four-lane road could benefit southeast Kansas

By The Associated Press

WINFIELD - A privately funded study of a Wichita-to-Joplin southeast Kansas highway project says a four-lane road could have a more substantial impact on the economy of the region than the improved two-lane favored by engineering consultants.

The report, ordered by the private. non-profit Highways for Progress Committee, was discussed during a series of meetings Monday that began with a breakfast session in Winfield. Fifth District Rep. Bob Whittaker, R-Kan., and one of the investigtors who helped prepare the study, Richard K. Hay of Pittsburg State University, also planned stops in Coffeyville, Parsons and Pitt-

Experts from Wichita State University, Emporia State University and the University of Kansas also worked on the study, which cost more than $100,000.

"The key is, from an economic development point of view, two lane highways do not have a substantial economic development impact,"

Hay said. "In order to get people to change their mind about where they're going to locate, that requires a four-lane,'

Hay acknowledged a good two-lane road would be better than what the 14-county southeast Kansas area has

An August special session of the Legislature may be the way to handle implementing recommendations from a special highway projects task force Gov. Mike Hayden has appointed, Whittaker told the approximately 50 people gathered at the Winfield Aea Chamber of Commerce breakfast. 'In my opinion, at this time, frankly, I think it's going to take the governor's leadership to succeed. I think that 1987 is going to be the crucial year," Whittaker said.

The economic impact and benefits study said a four-lane highway can cause, but doesn't guarantee economic development. The magnitude of economic impact is highly variable and is heavily dependent on how well local efforts work to attract businesses, the study said.

If a four-lane, limited access road is built along the route proximate to Galena, Pittsburg, Parsons, Fredonia and Neodesha, as designated by engineering consultants, the benefits during the fiveyear construction period would include 2,520 new jobs, a $1.7 billion increase in personal income and a 1.1 percent decline in the unemployment

An open-intersection four-lane, such as the one envisioned by engineering consultants as phase two of the southeast Kansas project, would add 1,999 jobs and increase income by $1.4 billion. The super-two highway recommended by the consultants as phase one would boost employment by 749 jobs and increase personal income $518 million, the study said.

With normal development efforts, the long-run benefits of a limited access four-lane during a 20-year period could include a population increase of 17,035, new jobs totalling 12,570, a $2.62 billion boost in personal income and a $1.48 billion increase in retail sales, the study said. Strong development efforts could yield a 53,335 increase in population, 29,370 jobs and personal income and retail sales increases of $6.76 billion and $4.95 billion, respectively, according to the study.

KSDB announcements offer 'safe sex' advice

By The Collegian Staff

Joining media across the country, KSDB has created two public service announcements designed to inform listeners about "safe sex."

"If you are considering a sexual relationship, you need to know this. The U.S. Surgeon General says there are only three ways to be sure you will not become infected with AIDS," one of the announcements begins.

"One - abstinence. Two - have sex only with a partner who is not an intravenous drug abuser or has not had sex with someone else during the past seven years. And three — use a condom."

The announcements are being run to alert people about taking precautions to avoid contracting sexually transmitted diseases.

Dave MacFarland, associate professor of radio and television and programming adviser for KSDB, said he wrote the PSAs in conjunction with Lafene Student Health Center and the Riley County Public Health Service.

"I wrote them after hearing the Surgeon General say the same basic three things I wrote in my (PSA) drafts concerning AIDS," Mac-Farland said.

The messages are not promoting sexual relations, he said. They are encouraging people to take precautions if they choose to engage in sexual intercourse.

"All the tapes make a case that abstinence is a perfectly fine way to go. If you decide to have sex, however, (the messages say) use a condom," MacFarland said.

The health department does warn that swimming in large patches of the Red Tide will cause irritation of the eyes, ears, nose and throat. If these symptoms occur, the health postponed until the patches break up and dissolve. The irritation will subside in about an hour after exposure to the Red Tide ceases. Respiratory problems can also occur when the wind is blowing and the tide is up.

more vocational-technical fundamentals and foreign languages to give high school graduates more to do than "hang out on the corner."

When Turner, a Manhattan businessman, went to the county clerk's office to register to run for a position on the school board, he found that no one was running against Clarenburg, so he registered for the two-year term instead of a four-year term, he said.

Turner said he would like to run for a four-year term after serving the two-year term, and six years on the board would be enough for him.

The importance of physical education within a school system is very important, Turner said.

Learning how to work as a team and get along in a social climate can be learned through a strong physical education program, he said
